PREFACE

TO THE NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE utility of Maunder's "TREASURY OF KNOWLEDGE," and the excellence of its plan, having secured for it a sale amounting now to upwards of one hundred thousand copies, it would be superfluous to recommend it to that numerous class who require a "LIBRARY OF REFERENCE" in the compendious form of a single volume.

Various corrections and improvements had, from time to time, been introduced; but of late years, the advancement of knowledge has, in every department, been so great and rapid, that the publishers resolved to reconstruct and reprint the work entirely, that it might more completely meet the wants and requirements of the present time. In preparing this edition, therefore, the whole work has been subjected to the most careful revision; errors have been corrected; what was antiquated has been rewritten; new matter has been added; the arrangement of its parts has been modified; and, in a word, no pains have been spared to render it more than ever worthy of the esteem and patronage it has so long enjoyed.

The "Compendious English Grammar" in this edition is entirely new. It consists of two parts. The First Part shows, by the analysis of a passage from Lord Bacon's Essays, how the Grammar of English Language can be studied practically, and yet so exactly and thoroughly, as to enable one, who is acquainted with his mother-tongue alone, to apprehend the secret of using it with force and accuracy. The Second Part is an original treatise, in which, by the adoption of a perfectly intelligible system, all the great facts and principles of English Grammar are exhibited, without the intervention of the inapplicable and misleading forms of the old Grammars; and so as to bring within the reach of all some of the most important discoveries of modern Philology. "A Concise History of the English Language" has been appended to it, and copious tables, illustrating the "Derivation and Formation of English Words."

Great attention has been given to the revision of the "New and Enlarged English Dictionary." Several thousands of words, now completely obsolete, or used as technical terms alone, have been removed, and replaced by a larger number of good words in general use, but not contained in former editions of this work, and in many instances not found in any English Dictionary hitherto published. The significations have throughout been corrected, and, wherever needful, extended. The accentuation has been revised. And, as fitting appendages to the Dictionary, the lists of Scripture Proper Names, with those of Christian Names, the tables of Verbal Distinctions, and the lists of common Abbreviations (carefully revised and corrected), have been placed next to it.

The Proverbs, Terms, Phrases, &c., have been newly arranged and translated. And the Mottoes, which in this, as in all former editions, surround the pages, have been subjected to a careful examination. A considerable number, on account of their incorrectness, or for other reasons, have been removed; and others, more in harmony with the general scope and tenor of the book, substituted for them.

Preface.

The revision of the Gazetteer and of the Geographical Tables (which are now brought together) has been effected by Mr W. Hughes, the Editor of the "Treasury of Geography," who has, by the excision of whatever was erroneous or out of date, and the insertion of the results of all the most recent discoveries and observations, rendered this portion of the work, although so compendious, of the highest value and usefulness.

Every article of the Classical Dictionary has been written anew, and the greatest care in the selection of the subjects exercised, that it might be, not a mere Classical Dictionary, but (what was so much required) a compendium of Classical History, Mythology, Biography, and Geography.

In the same way the Chronology has been converted into a Compendium of Modern History; by selecting for insertion lists of the Sovereigns of the great States of Europe, with detailed notices of our own Kings and Queens; and the Battles, Sieges, and other events, which have signalized the course of Modern History, and the advance of mankind to its present condition.

The Peerage has been entirely recast; and besides being corrected, from the best authorities, to the date of publication, is rendered more generally interesting and useful, by the addition of second titles, with those given by courtesy to the eldest sons, the dates of creations, and an Alphabetical List of Mottoes, to enable those who do not understand armorial heraldry, to determine the family to which any Baronial Escutcheon may belong.

Such important changes have taken place in Laws and Legislation within the last few years, that it has been necessary completely to rewrite the Law Dictionary, &c. This, which is the work of John Morris, Esq., an eminent lawyer in extensive practice in the metropolis, will be found not only much fuller than before, but so correct and intelligible, as to be a trustworthy guide in all ordinary exigencies.

The Useful Tables have, in this edition, been classified; and those relating to Commercial affairs, not only thoroughly revised, and adapted to the most recent regulations and usages, but extended by the addition of Tables of Foreign Money, Weights, and Measures, &c., which cannot fail to prove of the highest utility. In the Scientific and Miscellaneous division, also, similar additions and improvements will be found.

By these means, it is hoped that, as far as the bulk and the plan of the work will allow, this new edition of the "TREASURY OF KNOWLEDGE" will prove no unworthy contribution to the means by which those who have the welfare of their fellow-countrymen most at heart, are endeavouring to put within the reach of every rank the benefits and blessings of a sound and practical education.

B. B. WOODWARD.

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE PRESENT EDITION.

IN the Edition now issued care has been taken to make whatever changes and corrections have been rendered necessary by the course of events up to the present year (1876). The work has further been submitted to a general revision, which it is hoped may still further increase its usefulness.

COMPENDIOUS ENGLISH GRAMMAR;

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE DERIVATION AND FORMATION OF WORDS.

“Grammar is, as it were, the road to all other kinds of knowledge.”—
BACON, De Aug. lib. vi. cap. x.

I. A PRACTICAL METHOD OF ACQUIRING A KNOWLEDGE OF ENGLISH GRAMMAR.

1. GRAMMAR is the science of language, and its principal use is to enable those who study it to express their thoughts with correctness and propriety, so as to be understood by those whom they address.

It must always be remembered that grammars can only define, but cannot determine, the correct use of language. This depends, in every instance, upon the forms of thought and meaning to be conveyed; and in all languages was settled and employed long before the studies of grammarians commenced. And at this very time it may be seen how completely powerless are all the grammatical treatises on our own tongue, now existing, to prevent such changes as the disuse of the subjunctive mood of verbs, &c., from being made in the forms of the English language; by which the power of expressing some finer shades of meaning must be greatly circumscribed, if not entirely lost.

The best method, therefore, to be pursued by any one who desires to become practically and thoroughly acquainted with his mother tongue, is carefully to read some select works of our best authors, in the manner now to be described, with the help of such a compendious grammar as that contained in the following pages. This method, by the peculiar interest it excites, relieves the study of all drudgery; and at the same time furnishes one of the most satisfactory means of intellectual training, and an available introduction to the study of any other language to which the attention may afterwards be directed.

2. The following paragraphs form the commencement of Lord Bacon's Essay, “Of Studies.”

“1. Studies serve for delight, for ornament, and for ability. 2. Their chief use for delight is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in the judgment and disposition of business. 3. For expert men can execute and perhaps judge of particulars, one by one; but the general counsels, and the plots, and marshalling of affairs, come best from those that are learned. 4. To spend too much time in studies is sloth; to use them too much for ornament is affectation; to make judgment only by their rules is the humour of a scholar. 5. They perfect nature, and are perfected by experience; for natural abilities are like natural plants, that need pruning by study, and studies themselves do give forth directions too much at large, except they be bounded in by experience. 6. Crafty men condemn studies; simple men admire them; and wise men use them: for they teach not their own use; but that is a wisdom without them and above them, won by observation. 7. Read not to contradict and confute; nor to believe and take for granted; nor to find talk and discourse; but to weigh and consider.”

3. In the first paragraph we find something spoken of, “studies,” and something said about them, viz. that they “serve” for certain purposes, as “for delight,” “ornament,” and “ability.” The several parts may be arranged thus:—

Studies . . . serve . . . { for delight,
for ornament,
and
for ability.

They are thus distinguished according to their offices in the paragraph, which can readily be noticed, when thus arranged, without the employment of any names for them.

4. The paragraph numbered (2) may be arranged in this manner:—

Their chief use { for delight . . . is . . . in { privateness
and
retiring,
for ornament . . . is . . . in discourse,
and
for ability . . . is . . . in the { judgment
and
disposition } of business.

Here the three purposes mentioned in the former paragraph are the things spoken of; and certain things are said about each of them, though not exactly in the same manner as those purposes were said to be answered by “studies,” above. These two parts, therefore,—something spoken of, and something said about it,—we may note as essential to a complete and intelligible sentence of the kind before us; and we may adopt the names given to them by grammarians—SUBJECT and PREDICATE; which, signifying precisely what has just been said, require no further explanation.

5. Paragraph (3) we arrange thus:—

For... expert men ... can { execute
and } ... { particulars,
judge of } perhaps;
but ...
the general counsels
and
the { plots
and } of affairs } ... come ... { from those that are learned marshalling } best.

Both Subjects and Predicates here are somewhat complex. "Expert" is prefixed to "men;" "general" to "counsels;" and to "the plots and marshalling" are appended the words "of affairs;" just as in paragraph (2) "chief" was prefixed to "use," and "for delight, for ornament, and for ability" added to the same word, with the evident intention of circumscribing and defining it. And with a similar intention, the meaning of "can execute and judge of" is carried out and completed by "particulars" and "one by one;" and that of the latter Predicate, "can judge of," is further limited by the word, "perhaps," being attached to it. In the second part of the paragraph, also, "from those that are learned," and "best," are appended to the Predicate "come." And so in paragraph (1), "for delight, for ornament, and for ability," follow the word "serve;" and in paragraph (2), after "is," comes "in privateness and retiring, in discourse, &c."

It is evident, that these appended words and phrases, although they are of the highest moment to the full and precise expression of the thoughts; when regard is had to the structure of the sentences alone, are not essential, but subordinate parts thereof. And they have accordingly received from grammarians distinct names; those employed to describe and define subjects being designated ATTRIBUTIVES; and those employed with predicates,—for the purpose of modifying and supplementing their meaning,—OBJECTS; which terms we will use for the future, to avoid trouble and confusion.

6. But we may observe further, that the attributives, which have occurred in these paragraphs, are of two kinds. One kind (like the subjects) consists of names of things, called by grammarians NOUNS; as "delight," "ornament," "ability," "business," "affairs;" and these have before them the little words "of" and "for," which are known as PREPOSITIONS, to attach them to the subjects. The other kind consists of epithets merely, and not of names, as "chief," "expert," "general;" and they are called ADJECTIVES.

In paragraph (3) we find another word, "the," used very much in the same way as adjectives are used; except that its sole force is to point to the subject particularly spoken of; whence it has been named the DEMONSTRATIVE. And in paragraph (2) there is a word, "their," in form closely resembling it; but (in this instance) meaning, "of studies." It is plainly an adjective; but it is also called a PRONOUN, from its being thus used instead of a noun.

One other word, "and," which occurs in the subjects of these paragraphs, requires a passing glance. Its use is obvious; it connects certain parts of sentences together, so as to save much repetition, and the inconveniences that must result from it; and it is designated a CONJUNCTION.

7. Before we speak of the different kinds of objective words and phrases which we meet with in these paragraphs, some further notice should be taken of the predicates. In paragraph (1), and in the second example in paragraph (3), they are perfectly simple, consisting of the words "serve" and "come" alone:—words which convey assertions, and speak of some sort of action, and are called VERBS. "Can execute and judge of" (observe the use of the conjunction) are also verbs, but the latter has a preposition attached to it, to bring it into a particular relation with the objects that follow; and to both of them is prefixed the word "can," which alters their force from the assertion of action, to the assertion of the mere capability of it. In paragraph (2), again, we have for predicates, "in privateness and retiring," in "discourse," &c.,—which are plainly nouns with prepositions; and the quality of predicates is given to them by the employment of the word "is" with each, which changes them from attributives into assertions. "Is" must consequently be called a verb, although it only expresses being, and not action. The complex character of these predicates must be observed; and the conjunctions, the demonstrative, and the addition of the attributive, "of business," to one of them (which happens because they are actually nouns), carefully noted.

8. Turning now to the objects, we see in paragraph (1) that they indicate the purpose or effect of the action expressed by the verb; and, in this example, are nouns attached to the verb by the help of prepositions,— "for delight," "for ornament," &c. In paragraph (3), the first object, "particulars," which is also a noun, indicates that on which the action represented by the verbs, "execute and judge of," takes effect. Observe also, that just as in the words "studies," "plots," and "affairs," the fact that more than one of the kind is meant, is shown by the addition of the letter "s" to the ordinary word; whilst in the instance of "men," the same fact is indicated by the change of the vowel sound from "a" in "man."

EX.—SOME OF OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS HAVE EACH A GRAMMAR OF THEIR OWN.

KEY.—SOME OF OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS HAVE EACH A GRAMMAR OF ITS OWN.

A Compendious English Grammar.

The second object, "one by one," is of a different kind. It indicates the manner of execution and judgment; and consists of a word signifying number, called a numeral, repeated, with a preposition. "Perhaps," which is the third object, belongs to the predicate, "judge of," only; and is inserted for the purpose of lessening the strength of the assertion conveyed by the predicate. Words like it are called by grammarians ADVERBS. The second object in the other example contained in this paragraph, "best," is of the same class of words; but, instead of lessening the force of the predicate, it is employed to intensify it.

9. "From those that are learned," is a very remarkable kind of object; for it contains a complete sentence in itself. The actual object is "those," attached to the predicate by the preposition "from;" and indicating the source and origin of the action expressed by the verb. "Those" is not, however, the name of anything; but it stands here for "those men;" and thus partakes of the nature of pronouns, whilst it also serves demonstratively to point out the specific description of men spoken of. In consequence of its being in part a pronoun, it can have an attributive attached to it, and the sentence, "that are learned," serves as an attributive, to define and describe the "men" particularly intended.

To spend	...	{ too much time in studies, them }	...	is	...	sloth;
to use	...	{ for ornament, too much judgment; }	...	is	...	affectation,
to make	...	{ by their rules only }	...	is	...	the humour of a scholar.

Of these predicates, since they so nearly resemble those of paragraph (2), we only need to observe, that the nouns are used without prepositions to modify their meaning; and the word "a" (before "scholar"), contracted from "an," is a numeral, and merely means "one," but in what we may call a somewhat general way.

The remarkable character of these sentences lies in the subjects, which, as we can perceive at the first glance, are verbs with objects,—and yet are not accessory sentences, since no assertions are made. This form of the verb, with the preposition "to" prefixed, differs entirely from the forms we have seen employed in the predicates. Grammarians distinguish all verbs used in this last-named way, as being in the indicative mood; and those with "to" before them as being in the infinitive mood. They are in fact, as we see, used like nouns, only, being verbs, instead of attributives to define them, they have objects to complete them.

11. Some of these objects are in forms which we have already noticed; "time" and "judgment" are like "particulars" in paragraph (3), the direct objects of the action of the verbs they follow; "in studies" represents, by a very natural metaphor, that of place, the peculiar circumstances of the action spoken of; "for

The predicate of this sentence, "are learned," is of the same kind as those in paragraph (2), only an adjective takes the place of the nouns there used. The subject is neither a name nor an epithet, but a kind of pronoun, since it stands for "men," and plainly for the same men as "those" did; and, from its having relation thus to a noun already known, is called a relative pronoun. Sentences used in this manner are called accessory sentences, to mark their subordinate character, and their connection with the sentences of which they form parts, distinguished as principal sentences.

Only two words remain to be spoken of. "For," at the commencement of this paragraph, shows its connection in meaning with the preceding paragraph; or, more correctly, with the last sentence in it; for which it assigns a reason. "But," on the other hand, separates the two parts of this paragraph, by way of contrast; so that it is manifest, that not the first, but the second part of it, contains the reason for the assertion made in the foregoing paragraph. Both words are called conjunctions, from their thus serving to connect otherwise disjoined and independent sentences together; yet it is evident that they are not conjunctions of the same nature as "and."

10. Paragraph (4) contains three principal sentences:—

"ornament" precisely resembles the "for delight," &c., of paragraph (1); but the object, "by their rules," expresses the means by which the action of the verb is accomplished. "Them," we see, is a pronoun, as it stands for the word "studies;" and it is the direct object of the verb "use;" it is one of the very few words in our language which have two forms, one employed when it is a subject, "they," and another when it is an object, as we find it here, "them." Here are also two objects belonging to the class of words called adverbs, "much" and "only," both of them expressive of the manner in which the action of the verbs they follow is performed; and the first of them has the adverb "too" prefixed, for the purpose of intensifying the meaning of "much."

The first object has the words "too much" prefixed, as an attributive; "too" being here, as in the instance last noted, an adverb expressive of intensity; but "much," what is termed an indefinite numeral, expressing quantity merely in a general way. There is another of the series with an attributive prefixed, "their rules;" but of this we have spoken in connexion with paragraph (2).

12. We find the next paragraph (5) rather complex; as this arrangement of it shows:—

They ... { perfect nature,
 and
 are perfected ... by experience. [study;
 natural abilities ... are .. like natural plants .. that .. need .. pruning by
 for { and
 studies themselves .. do give { directions
 forth,
 too much at large,
 except .. they .. be bounded .. { in [cncc.
 by experi-

In the first part of this paragraph we find the same pronoun used as a subject, which we have just seen in its objective form. Grammarians call these different forms cases; and that now before us, the nominative or subjective case; that in the last paragraph, the accusative or objective case.

13. The first predicate and object are in the same form as several we have seen above ; but the second predicate is quite new to us. It signifies that "experience perfects studies," just as "they perfect nature;" but we find what should be the subject following the predicate, and the real object in the place appropriated to the subject: the form of the predicate too is changed, and a preposition is inserted between it and the word "experience." We must admit, however, that the passage would lose immensely, in compactness, vivacity, and force, if it were written thus—"They perfect nature, and experience perfects them;" so that the reason for using this peculiar form is manifest.

It is distinguished by grammarians thus. When the agent of the verb is the subject, the verbal form employed is called active; but when the immediate object of the verb is the agent the form employed is called passive. And in our tongue, all passive forms, just as in this instance, consist of that form of the verb which grammarians call the perfect participle,—a form resembling an adjective in this, that it can be used as an attributive; but, also partaking of the nature of a verb, inasmuch as the notion it conveys is modified so as to express the completeness of the action. The object following this verb here expresses the means by which what is spoken of the subject is effected; as we have seen before. How the two sentences are combined by the conjunction, so that one subject serves for both, we need not more particularly point out.

14. "For," prefixed to the second part of the paragraph, introduces two reasons for the last assertion respecting the influence of "experience" upon "studies;" as was seen in paragraph (3). Of the first reason, we have only to say, that the 'real predicate of the sentence is "like," to which the words, "natural plants," are added as an object; and that in the accessory sentence, added as a second attributive to "plants," whilst "pruning" is the immediate object of the verb "need," "by study" is an object annexed to "pruning." For this last word is another of the participles, properly the imperfect one; which, like the verb, at times requires some attempering object, as we see here.

In the second reason we must notice, first, an attributive attached to the subject, which we have not met with before,—“themselves.” It is undoubtedly a pronoun, and it is here used as a most emphatic demonstrative. The objective form of one part of it, “them,” does not concern us here. Next, we notice the predicate, which is in a form we have not before seen ; but which is only equivalent to the word “give,” alone, except that it is rather more emphatic. Grammarians call these words, “do,” “can,” “are,” &c., when employed as in this case, auxiliary, or helping verbs. The first and second objects to this sentence do not require particular notice ; and in the third, “too much at large,” it is only needful to observe the use of an adjective preceded by a preposition, and having an adverbial phrase, which we have met with, before it, to express the manner of the action.

Of the third object, which is an accessory sentence, more is to be said. It is annexed to the principal sentence by means of a conjunction, "except," which implies some limitation to the meaning of the predicate and the preceding objects; but the form of its own predicate is different from any we have yet seen. Comparing it with the second predicate in this paragraph, "are perfected," we find that it is a passive form; but the employment of "be" instead of "are," shows that the limitation hinges upon the effect of "experience" upon the "studies," spoken of. The forms of verbs which are thus used, to express contingency, have been called by grammarians the subjunctive mood; they are far more rarely used now than they once were, and have, indeed, almost entirely disappeared from our spoken language.

15. Paragraph (6) affords us an opportunity of remarking some other facts in English Grammar:—

Crafty men ... contemn ... studies;
simple men ... admire ... them;
and
wise men ... use ... them;
for ... they teach { their own use,
not;
but ... that is ... a wisdom { without them,
above them,
won by observation.

A Compendious English Grammar.

5

In the first three sentences there is nothing new to observe, except the use of the conjunction "and," without any abbreviation or condensation; it here serves only to combine all three assertions together, so that the reasons assigned in the remainder of the paragraph are seen to apply equally to all. We may, however, notice the fact, that the association of the several attributives with their objects is effected entirely by juxtaposition; there being nothing in the forms of the words specially to indicate their relation to the words they belong to. But the relation of the predicates to their subjects is shown by the agreement of their forms in one essential particular, called by grammarians number. Thus in paragraph (2) the noun "use," which is the subject, expresses but one thing; and the form of the verb, "is," applies to no more than one; whilst in paragraph (5), "they" (which is equivalent to "studies") and "abilities," referring to more things than one, have the form of the verb "are," which also applies to more than one, in the predicates following them. And similarly here, the subjects being in the plural number, "men," the verbs in the predicates are also in the plural, "contemn," "admire," "use."

In like manner the place occupied by the word "studies," shows it to be the object of the verb "contemn;" but the relation of the objects to the predicates in the other two sentences is indicated not only by their position, but (as we have before observed) also, and more certainly, by the form employed, "them."

16. Little needs to be said respecting the first sentence, which is introduced by the conjunction "for," most of its forms being familiar; but we may note the use of the word "own," an adjective rendering the pronoun, "their," emphatic. In the last sentence the subject is not a relative, but a demonstrative pronoun, and its reference to the "use" of "studies" is shown by the order of the words, or, as the grammarians say, by the construction. Besides this, only the attributives to the predicate, which is here a noun, require remark; for two of them, "without them, and above them," are pronouns attached by prepositions, exactly as we have seen nouns attached, in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4), but showing their subordinate position to the subject, by being in the objective or accusative case; and the third, "won by observation," is a participle with an object expressive of means.

This participle is not formed in the same way as those were formed which we have before met with. "Perfect-ed" and "bound-ed" have been made by the addition of the final syllable; but "won" is formed by the change of the vowel in the verb "win."

17. The last paragraph (7) we thus arrange:—

		to	{ contradict and confute;
Read	{	not
		nor	to { believe and take for granted;
		nor	to find { talk and discourse;
		but	to { weigh and consider.

Here we have a predicate, "read," and a considerable number of objects, but there is no subject; yet the sense is complete. There is, however, no assertion made by the verb; on the contrary, it conveys a command; and the subject, if expressed, would not occupy the customary place to the left of the predicate, but would come between it and the objects. Grammarians distinguish the forms of verbs which signify commands as the imperative mood. The four principal groups of objects belong to one and the same class, that which expresses the purpose or design of the action; and they are so combined by the conjunctions, "nor" and "but," as to enable a single verb to act as predicate to them all. The conjunction, "nor," serves to give to the second and third groups the same negative character that is imparted to the first by the negative object "not;" and the fourth is contrasted with all the preceding groups, as stating the design that should be kept in view in reading, by the use of "but."

In the expression, "to take for granted," we have a participle attached to a verb by means of a preposition, as an object needful to complete it; and the next group shows two nouns, "talk and discourse," combined by the conjunction "and," so as to spare the repetition of the verb "to find," to which they both serve as "objects."

18. From this illustration, extending only to seven paragraphs—and those neither long nor very greatly complicated—may be seen, both what English grammar actually is, and what a large and clear knowledge of its facts and laws may be attained by the plan of study which we have recommended. It may also be seen how completely language is the product and representation of the thought or meaning of those who speak or write; and how subordinate is the office of the grammarian—limited, in fact, to the elucidation and interpretation of the forms and principles of language, by the most general laws and forms of thought. For not only cannot the grammarian determine what forms shall be used, and what discountenanced and avoided; but he cannot possibly frame his declensions and conjugations, his con-

cords and governments, so as to provide a place for every combination and inflexion, and mode of giving expression to the infinitely diversified shades of meaning, even in the language of common life.

19. The following example will show how easy it is to analyse and arrange the most complicated paragraphs, so as to exhibit, without the employment of a single technical term, every fact both of Etymology and Syntax contained in it. The passage is from Locke's "Essay concerning Human Understanding." Book iv. chap. i. § 1.

"God, having designed man for a sociable creature, made him not only with an inclination, and under a necessity, to have fellowship with those of his own kind, but furnished him also with language, which was to be the great instrument and common tie of society."

EX.—THE ENEMIES WHO WE HAVE MOST TO FEAR ARE OUR OWN HEARTS.

II. A COMPENDIOUS ENGLISH GRAMMAR.

1. Grammar is divided into two parts,—one which treats of the classification, formation, derivation, and inflection of words by themselves, and is called Etymology;—and another, which treats of the combination of words into sentences, &c., and is called Syntax.

In this short treatise the formation and derivation of words are not included under Etymology, but are added by way of illustration to the concise History of the English Language, which forms the concluding portion of it. By this means, not only is some repetition spared, but, being disencumbered of that which is rather curious than useful, this Etymology is rendered more serviceable to those for whom it is specially intended.

Both Etymology and Syntax, it must be observed, are arranged, in the first place, with a view to assist in a study of the English language of the kind we have described above; and next, to present such an elucidation of its principal facts, and such an interpretation of its most important laws, as shall give to those who consider them attentively, some real and practical knowledge of their own tongue. And with the same intent, those technicalities only have been introduced, and those examples selected, which might be expected to aid in the simplification and explanation of the subject.

2. ETYMOLOGY. Letters, &c.—There are twenty-six letters in the English Alphabet; which have always been arranged in the following order, and are of these forms in Roman type: A a, B b, C c, D d, E e, F f, G g, H h, I i, J j, K k, L l, M m, N n, O o, P p, Q q, R r, S s, T t, U u, V v, W w, X x, Y y, Z z.

The number of sounds to be represented by these letters is estimated at about forty; and, in consequence, several of them have to stand for more sounds than one. It is somewhat remarkable that, since this is the case, the letters c, q, and x should be superfluous; the two sounds of c being represented by s and k, as in cell, sell; calends, kalends; q, being always followed by u, with the sound expressible by kw; and the sounds of x differing in no respect from those of ks, gz, and z (in some words borrowed from the French). It would be of considerable advantage, if symbols for the sounds represented now by the combinations of letters, ch, sh, th, ng, &c., could be devised and introduced; but this is a matter of such great difficulty, as to be almost impossible.

3. The twenty-six letters are divided into two classes—Vowels and Consonants. The vowels are, a, e, i, o, u; and with them w and y ought to be placed. They represent the sounds which are produced by the transmission of the voice through the mouth, whilst the cavity is more or less enlarged in different directions. All the rest are named consonants, and represent the sounds produced when the voice is interrupted by the voluntary action of the throat, tongue, palate, nose, teeth, and lips.

KEY.—THE ENEMIES WHOM WE HAVE MOST TO FEAR ARE OUR OWN HEARTS.

A Compendious English Grammar.

7

Our vowel sounds differ from those of all other languages of Europe; one of the sounds which we express by a, they express by e; where we write e, they write i; where we use i, they employ ei; and our u corresponds with their eu. The natural series of vowel sounds, expressed in letters of our alphabet, is ee, ay, ah, oh, oo.

The combinations of vowel sounds, called diphthongs and triphthongs, such as ae, ai, au, ei, ie, oe, oi, ou, eau, &c., express the intermediate sounds of this series, but they also do not correspond with those of the other European languages.

4. Consonants are divided into three orders, Mutes, Sibilants, and Liquids; and these are further subdivided according to the organs employed in giving utterance to them. Thus the mutes are classified first as Smooth or Aspirated, and next in the following manner; the sounds for which we have no symbols being inserted in their proper places:—

	[SMOOTH.]		ASPIRATED.
	Sudden.	Gradual.	Sudden.	Gradual.
Guttural;	k, c, q	g	ch (not English)	gh (not English)
Dental	t	d	th (in)	th (ine)
Labial	p	b	f, ph	v
The ch here is the terminal sound of the Scotch word "loch;" and the gh , that of the Irish word "lough." The letter h finds no place in this scheme, because it is, in fact, nothing but a sign of the transmission of the breath called "aspiration," and not of a sound at all.
The sibilants may be classified thus:—
	Sudden.	Gradual.
Dental	s, c	z
Dental and Palatal	sh	ch (est)
Dental and Guttural	(a) z (ure)	j
And the liquids may be arranged in this manner:—
Simple	Guttural r
	Palatal l
	Guttural (ki) ng
Nasal	Dental n
	Labial m
The letter x represents the sounds of ks, gs , and sometimes of z .
5. Of the sounds expressed by the composition of various letters, both vowels and consonants, nothing more can be said, than that some of them are identical with sounds treated of above; and others are compounded of such sounds. Thus the sound of the word buoy is identical with that of boy ; and in "adhesive," the sound d is pronounced distinctly, and followed by the aspirate, or hard-breathing, h .
6. Derivation and Formation of Words.—With the History of our Tongue, which follows this Grammar, the subject is illustrated so as to show the relation of the English language to other languages, which have formerly existed, or are spoken at the present day. Here only the "internal relations" of words are regarded; and the sole purpose is the illustration of the manner in which, from the radical words, wherein may be traced the ethnological connections of the English race, other words have in various ways been formed by the natural vitality and power of the language.
7. Radical words (called by etymologists "roots," simply) are either nouns, verbs, adjectives, or pronouns; expressive of common things, conditions, actions, &c. Primary Derivatives are constructed by slight changes in the vowel-sounds, or in the consonants, or in both; and are sometimes designated "stems." Secondary Derivatives are formed by means of prefixes and affixes, from both roots and primary derivatives. Ex.:—
	Roots.	Prim. Deriv.	Second. Deriv.
Bake		batch	baker, baxter
Bear		bier, birth	barrow, for-bear

Ex. I, thou, he, they; mine, thine; this, those; whom, what.

Whatever exists, or acts, or is acted upon, is regarded as being, or acting, or being acted on, in some particular time, place, manner, &c.; and these modifications of the simple notions indicated by the verb are expressed by a class of words called Adverbs. Ex. Now, where, so, seldom, perhaps.

Many of the relations of notions one to another, also, are those of place, time, manner, means, &c.; and these are expressed by words called Prepositions, which serve to connect nouns and pronouns with other nouns and pronouns, and with verbs. Ex. From, by, of, to, after.

The connection of things, &c., with each other, and of thoughts with other thoughts, is shown by means of Conjunctions. Ex. And, or, but, though, for.

Numerals are in part names, and in part attributives and adverbs; and therefore do not properly form a class by themselves. Ex. Two, four, six; first, tenth, hundredth; firstly, secondly, lastly.

Interjections, which are expressions of emotions, such as fear, joy, pain, wonder, &c., and not of thought, and the greater number of which are rather sounds than words, cannot be noticed in a grammar; although it is convenient to have such a class to which certain expressions which occur in the Dictionary may be referred. Ex. Ah! O! Ha!

11. Nouns. The Gender of Nouns is determined by the sex of the persons or beings they represent, being called Masculine or Feminine, as they are the names of males or females. Beings without natural sex, things without life, and abstractions, are called Neuter.

Figuratively, sex is attributed to many beings naturally having no such distinction, and to abstractions:—Ex. The sun, he is setting; the moon, she is rising; charity, she is the child of heaven. Very small beings, whatever sex they may be of, and those whose sex is not their distinctive characteristic, are spoken of as neuter. Ex. The ant, it is a patron of foresight and prudence; the child, it knows not what it does.

Very few words, in English, have terminations, or other specialties of form, indicative of their gender; the following are examples of the only kinds, and they are not numerous. Ex. Arbiter, Arbitress; Prosecutor, Prosecutrix; Margrave; Margravine; he-bear, she-bear; Man-servant, Maid-servant. In other instances different words are appropriated to the two sexes, but without any peculiarity of termination. Ex. Brother, Sister; Horse, Mare; King, Queen.

12. The only distinction of Number is that between one and more than one; the ordinary forms expressing the former, and being called Singular; and special forms being used for the latter, called Plural.

Most commonly, s or (when it ends in a sibilant or x) es is added to the singular. Ex. Sword, swords; fish, fishes. Words ending in f or fe generally make their plurals in ves. Ex. Calf, calves; life, lives. But all words ending in ff, except staff.

EX.—AT THAT PERIOD I WISHED ANYBODY WOULD HANG ME A HUNDRED TIMES.

8. Derivative words are also formed by composition; that is, by the construction of a single word out of two or more words, each capable of being used independently. These compounds differ entirely from the secondary derivatives, and are found in every class of English words. They are not, however, so numerous in our tongue as in the German; and in that they are less common than in the Greek language. Ex. Sunshine, fairhaired, thunderstorm, harvestman, daybreak, nevertheless, therefore, into, everlasting, midnight, noontime, elsewhere, however, undersell, overturn, because, hedgerow, warehouseman, earthquake, steamengine, railroad.

9. Classes of words.—The classification of words depends upon their signification as parts of sentences, which will be treated of under the head of "Syntax." The following will, however, suffice as an introduction to this part of the Grammar; and the nature of Subjects and Predicates, Attributives and Objects, with the various means of expressing the relations between them, will be treated of in the succeeding division.

Names of things, persons, and of whatever exists even in imagination, are called Nouns, and sometimes Substantives. Ex. Tree, stone; man, boy; Cæsar, Wellington; virtue, hope.

Words expressing an assertion respecting an action or condition, or the reception of the consequences of an action, or simply respecting existence, are called Verbs. Ex. To run; to strike; to sleep, to be; to be beaten.

Attributives which can only in figurative language be used without a noun (which they qualify in some way) are called Adjectives. Ex. Good, bad, green, high, everlasting.

These are the three principal classes of words, which represent distinct notions of things, persons, actions, qualities, &c. &c., formed in the mind. Other words express not so much the notions we have formed, as the connection of those notions with each other, or their relations to us, or some of the infinitely various associations of thoughts.

10. Pronouns serve not only to prevent the too frequent repetition of the same nouns, but yet more to indicate the relation of the persons or things spoken of to the speaker. Such are the Personal Pronouns. Others are used as attributives, but they also show the relations of the subjects they characterize to the speaker.

A Compendious English Grammar.

staves, and several words in f or fe, add s without any change of letters for the plural. Ex. Whiff, whiffs; grief, griefs; fife, fifes. Those ending in o, preceded by a vowel, add s only; but if a consonant precede the o, s or es is added. Ex. Cameo, cameos; ratio, ratios; cargo, cargoes; volcano, volcanoes; portico, porticos; solo, solos. Words ending in y after a consonant have ies in the plural. Ex. fly, flies; history, histories.

A very few change the vowel sound of the singular. Ex. Foot, feet; goose, geese; tooth, teeth; woman, women (pronounced wimmen). One adds en to the singular, —ox, oxen. One both changes the vowel and adds en, —brother, brethren.

Besides these, the following must be noted. Child makes children in the plural. Mouse has mice, and louse, lice; but it is the spelling only which is peculiar. Penny has two plurals; when coins are meant, pennies, but when money is spoken of, pence. In like manner die, signifying a stamp for coining, has dies; but when it means a cube used in play, dice. Pea has peas and pease, the latter signifying peas collectively, or used for food. Kine is sometimes used as a plural to cow.

Deer, sheep, swine, are used in both numbers; and (when spoken of as food) fish, cod, salmon, &c. The names of metals are made plural only when employed to signify some particular things composed of them. Ex. Irons, coppers, brasses. Articles of trade and commerce which, in ordinary language, are never used in the plural form, have plural forms in the market. Ex. Cloth, oil, sugar, tea, &c. On the other hand, beast, which has a regular and commonly used plural, is employed in the singular form alone by Smithfield salesmen. Words signifying abstract qualities seldom take the plural form, because they cannot have a plural meaning, except when used figuratively. Ex. The honours of the world; the decencies of life. Names of measures, weights, of some numbers, and of terms employed numerically, are in some instances used in the singular form, with a plural meaning. Ex. A ten-pound note, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight, an army of eighty thousand men, twelve dozen of wine, three brace of dogs, a fleet of twenty sail, twelve thousand foot and three thousand horse, fifteen thousand stand of arms, a hundred head of cattle, each weighing thirty stone.

Alms, means, news, pains, and riches, which are plural in form, are used both as singulars and as plurals. Ashes, bellows, breeches, cates, dregs, gallows, pincers, scissors, and tongs, have no singulars, either in form or meaning. The names of some sciences, derived from the Greek language, are plural in form, but in meaning singular. Ex. Ethics, hydrostatics, mathematics, mechanics, politics. And so is the term morals. Suds, and wages, plural in form, are singular in signification; and pulse (leguminous seeds), also plural in form, is simply collective in its meaning.

13. Almost all nouns, which have been simply adopted from foreign languages, retain their original plurals; but some have also plurals formed in the English fashion, and in a few instances with a different meaning. The following is a nearly complete list of these words:—

14. When a noun is the subject of a sentence it is said to be in the nominative case, and when it immediately follows a verb or a preposition it is said to be in the objective case. But its form is precisely the same in both cases. Ex. Nom. The man walks; trees grow. Obj. I pity the man; he fells the trees;—with the man; under the trees.

When one noun, in either the singular or plural number, is used along with another attributively, and indicating its possessor or origin, 's (with an apostrophe before it, which shows that a vowel sound has been dropped) is added to the former, except when it ends in a sibilant, when most frequently only the apostrophe is added. Ex. A soldier's life, the soldiers' friend; the jury's verdict, the judges' sentence; Thomas's horse (read "Thomases"); the fox' (read "foxes") brush; "He that despised Moses' law died;" "If ye suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye."

15. In order to individualize the application of common nouns, two words usually designated articles, one a demonstrative pronoun, the, the other a numeral, an (or, as abbreviated before a consonant sound, a), almost universally precede them. The former, which is called the definite article, is used before nouns of both numbers. Ex. The man, the men; the horse, the horses. The latter is called the indefinite article, and is used before nouns in the singular number only. Ex. A man, an hour, a tree, an enemy.

KEY.—I LOOKED AT HIM AGAIN, AND WAS GLAD TO FIND HE BREATHED SO MUCH MORE EASILY.

Proper names, abstract nouns, names of materials, and some other classes of nouns, take the articles only when they are used as common nouns. Ex. Solon, Brutus, hope, fear, water, wood; the Solon of his country; he is a Brutus; the hopes and fears of youth; the water's edge; the wood of the ark.

16. Verbs. When the action signified by a verb takes effect immediately on any person or thing as its object, the verb is called transitive or active; but when the action is completely described by the verb itself, or when the verb signifies a condition, it is called intransitive or neuter. Ex. We suspect deceit, he loves truth; I walk or run, they sleep, you stand. Many verbs, as may be seen in the English Dictionary, are both active and neuter. Ex. To abate a nuisance, the storm abated; to account a man wise, to account for one's conduct.

Transitive verbs are conjugated in two ways, one form, called active, is used when the agent is the subject of the verb. Ex. I esteem him; they speak both French and German; the Allies defeated the Russians. The other is used when the agent is the immediate object of the verb, and is called passive. Ex. He is esteemed by me; both French and German are spoken by them; the Russians were defeated by the Allies.

In the conjugation of verbs, four moods are distinguished—the indicative, the subjunctive, the imperative, and the infinitive,—and another class of forms, called participles. The indicative is used when the speaker asserts something as actually existing or acting. Ex. He reads, we walked, they will consent, thou art punished, I was exalted, you will be confounded. The subjunctive is used when some possible or probable action or state of being is spoken of. Ex. "If I be a father, where is mine honour?" "Though thou detain me, I will not eat;" "If he were a prophet, he would have known who touched him;" "Though these three men were in it, they should deliver neither son nor daughter." When a command is given, the imperative is employed. Ex. "Honour all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the king." The infinitive mood consists of the substantive forms, and the participles of the attributive forms, of the verb to which they belong. The preposition to is prefixed to all infinitives, except those which follow auxiliary verbs, and such verbs as see, hear, &c., in the active voice. Ex. "To err is human; to forgive, divine;" to have praised, to have been blamed; I saw him weep, he was seen to weep; erring, forgiven; "having nothing, and yet possessing all things."

17. The three tenses of verbs, or the times in which an action or event may be said to take place, are the present, the past, and the future; and in each of them, it may be considered as indefinitely, or imperfectly, or perfectly, accomplished. Ex. (Indef. pres.) I read, (imperf. pres.) I am reading, (perf. pres.) I have read; (indef. past) I read, (imperf. past) I was reading, (perf. past) I had read; (indef. fut.) I shall read, (imperf. fut.) I shall be reading, (perf. fut.) I shall have read. In the subjunctive mood, the tense-forms express the probability or improbability of the event or action spoken of. Ex. (Prob.) "What matter where, if I be still the same?" "Though thou detain me, I will not eat." (Improb.) "If ye were of the world, the world would love his own." "If ye loved me, ye would rejoice."

The imperative mood admits of no distinctions of time, but only of the completeness or incompleteness of the action commanded. Ex. (Imperf.) Read thou (perf.) Have done!

In the infinitive mood, the only tense is the present. Ex. (Indef. pres.) to read, (imperf. pres.) to be reading, (perf. pres.) to have read. And the participles admit only of the distinctions of completeness and incompleteness of the action spoken of. Ex. (Imperf.) reading, (perf.) read.

18. By means of a class of verbs, called Auxiliary Verbs, the capability of expressing the several relations of mood, tense, &c., is greatly extended and refined. Those tenses which are formed without the assistance of auxiliaries are called simple tenses, and the others, compound. Ex. We hope, you fear, they fled; I am hoping, thou hast feared, he has fled, we shall learn.

The auxiliary verbs of mood are such as may and can, which express possibility; must, ought, and shall, which express obligation; shall and will, expressing determination of will; might, could, and would, expressing desire; let and may, implying permission; do, which adds emphasis to assertion, and is employed in negatives and questions, &c. &c. Ex. It may be so, he can do it, you must see that you should obey, "these things ought not so to be," we shall see to that, I will be heard, might it but be so! could we but know it, would he were here! let him do what he will, you may do as you please, we do like simplicity, it does not signify, do you see the meaning?

The auxiliary verbs of tense are such as be, be about, be going, begin, do, have, keep, shall, will, &c. Ex. You are chosen, they were laughing, we are about to depart, we are going to learn French, I did once think, he has seen too much, they kept expecting what was impossible, he would dance and sing the whole day long.

All the moods, tenses, &c., of the passive forms of verbs are made by the help of the verb be. Ex. I am praised, we were loved, they shall be beaten, to be afflicted, having been disappointed.

19. The only distinctive personal forms are those of the second and third persons singular of the present indefinite tense, and the second person singular of the past indefinite; all the other persons in each of the simple tenses are alike. Ex. I lead, thou leadest, he leads (leadeth), we lead, you lead, they lead. I led, thou leddest, he led, we led, you led, they led.

Impersonal verbs, of which there are but two in our language (strictly so to be called), are found only in the third person singular. Ex. "Meseems I hear her singing loud," meseemed; "methinks he breaks it," "methought I saw my late espoused wife." But other verbs are often used impersonally. Ex. It rained last night, it liked him well, it behoved him to do the same.

20. By far the greater number of English verbs, including all that have been recently introduced, and almost all derivatives, are of the class called weak verbs, that is, they form their past indefinite tenses, and their perfect participles, by the addition of d (or t) to the present, or ed when the present ends in d or t. Ex. Hope, hoped; light, lighted. But it must be observed, there is a great difference between our spoken and our written language, in this particular; the forms of the latter having departed widely from the sounds of the former. Ex. Walk, walked (pron. walkd); step, stepped (pron. stept); stab, stabbed (pron. stabd); bar, barred (pron. bard).

The remainder form their past indefinite tenses and perfect participles either by modifying the verbal sound, and adding n (or en) for the participle (being of the class called strong verbs); by modifying the vowel, and adding t for the participle; by changing the terminal d into t; or by retaining the present form for both the tense and the participle. But the tendency to uniformity is so strong that many of these verbs have lost one or both of their peculiar forms, and others have two forms for the past indefinite and perfect participle.

21. The following is a complete list of these verbs, classified mainly by their present forms, yet not without regard to their original forms in the Anglo-Saxon. It must be observed that the original forms of many of these verbs are obsolete, or preserved in provincial usage only (and such forms are enclosed in parentheses); and that sometimes the past tense is used for the participle, and sometimes the terminal n or en has been dropped.

First Division. Verbs which change their vowel sounds, and form their perfect participles by adding en or n, or strong verbs.

1st Class. Vowels e and a, becoming e, a, or o.

Present Indefinite Tense.	Past Indefinite Tense.	Perfect Participle.
Delve	(dolve, dalf) delved	delved
Get	got (gat)	(gotten) got

Throw	threw	thrown
Let (late)	let	let
Slay	slew	slain
Laugh	(loghe, leugh) laughed	laughed

4th Class. Vowel o, shortened.

Choose	chose (chase)	chosen
Go		gone
Lose	lost	(lorn) lost
Shoot	shot	shotten, shot
Do	did	done

5th Class.

Come	came	come
------	------	------

Note, that the participle "sawn" seems to have been formed analogically after "drawn;" also, that the word did is a contracted form; and the vowel i does not represent the o of the present, but is the short vowel sound of a reduplication of the d. It is the only instance in our language.

22. Second Division. Verbs which change their vowel sounds, but form their perfect participles in d or t; and are therefore weak verbs.

1st Class. Vowels shortened.

Bleed	bled	bled
Breed	bred	bred
Feed	fed	fed
Meet	met	met
Read	read	read
Speed	sped	sped
Bereave, reave	bereft, bereaved	bereft, bereaved
(Clepe)		y-clept
Deal	dealt	dealt
Deem	(dempt) deemed	deemed
Dream	dreamt, dreamed	dreamt, dreamed
Feel	felt	felt

Hear	heard	heard
Keep	kept	kept
Kneel	knelt, kneeled	knelt, kneeled
Lean	leant, leaned	leant, leaned
Mean	meant	meant
Sleep	slept	slept
Sweep	swept	swept
Shoe	shod	shod

2nd Class. Vowels a, e, i, and o, changed into o, au, ou.

Sell	sold	sold
Tell	told	told
Catch	caught, catched	caught, catched
Reach	(raught) reached	(raught) reached
Stretch	(straught, streight) stretched	stretched
Teach	taught	taught

A Compendious English Grammar.

Present Indefinite Tense.	Past Indefinite Tense.	Perfect Participle.
Distract	distracted	(distraught) distracted
Freight	freighted	fraught, freighted
Shall	should
Will	would (woll)
May	(mought) might
Beseech	besought	besought
Bring	brought	brought
Buy	bought	bought
Owe	ought, owed	owed
Seek	sought	sought
Think	thought	thought
Work	wrought, worked	wrought, worked

Note, that the y in "y-cleft" is the old participial prefix of which only one other instance remains in occasional use in our language, "y-clad."

Note also, that both "distraught" and "fraught" are formed from words derived from other languages.

23. Third Division. Contracted Weak Verbs.

Have	had	had
Make	made	made
Lay	laid	laid
Pay	paid	paid
Say	said	said
Dwell	dwelt, dwelled	dwelt, dwelled
Pen	penned	penned
Spill	spilt, spilled	spilt, spilled
(Wis)	(wist)
Bend	bent, bended	bent, bended
Build	built, builded	built, builded
Gild	gilt, gilded	gilt, gilded
Gird	girt, girded	girt, girded
Lend	lent	lent
Rend	rent	rent
Send	sent	sent
Shend	shent	shent
Spend	spent	spent

Rid	rid	rid
Roast	roasted	roast, roasted
Set	set	set
Shed	shed	shed
Shred	shred	shred
Shut	shut	shut
Split	split, splitted	split, splitted
Spread	spread	spread
Thrust	thrust	thrust
Wet	wet, wetted	wet, wetted

24. Defective Verbs.

Am	was	been
Clothe	clad, clothed	(y-clad) clothed
Go	went	gone

In the first of these, each part belongs to a different verb; in the second, "clad" and "y-clad" are derived from some word not greatly unlike "clothe;" and both forms in this kind have appeared in the preceding lists.

25. Irregular Verbs.

Can	could
Dare, durst	durst

A Compendious English Grammar.

It is the introduction of the l into "could," which makes the former of these irregular. The other appears to have adopted its original past tense as an additional form for the present: when used transitively, in the meaning of "to challenge or provoke," its past tense and perfect participle are "dared."

26. Conjugation of Auxiliary Verbs.

1. To BE.

Indicative Mood. Present Indefinite Tense.

Sing. 1. I am,	2. Thou art,	3. He is.
Plur. 1. We are,	2. You are,	3. They are.

Infinitive Mood. Present Indefinite Tense.

To have.

Participles.

Imperfect. Having. Perfect. Had.

3. To Do.

Indicative Mood. Present Indefinite Tense.

Sing. 1. I do,	2. Thou dost,	3. He doth or does.
Plur. 1. We do,	2. You do,	3. They do.

Past Indefinite Tense.

Sing. 1. I did,	2. Thou diddest, or didst,	3. He did.
Plur. 1. We did,	2. You did,	3. They did.

Subjunctive Mood. Probable form.

Sing. and plur. (If) I, thou, he, we, you, they do.

Improbable form.

Sing. and plur. (If) I did; thou didst; he, we, you, they did.

Infinitive Mood. Present Indefinite.

To do.

Participles.

Imperfect. Doing. Perfect. Done.

In the auxiliaries, may, can, shall, will, the only change of form is in the second person singular, which are mayest, mightest; canst, couldst; shalt, shouldst; wilt, wouldst; in the present and past tenses respectively. Let and must have no inflexions, and ought (which admits of no distinction of time) has oughtest in the second person singular.

KEY.—WE WERE OBLIGED TO ADOPT SOME MEASURES.

KEY.—EVERYTHING SINCE THAT EVENT HAS WORN A NEW ASPECT.

A Compendious English Grammar.

Note. That by means of the various auxiliaries a great number of additional tenses, in all the moods, might be formed.

Note also, that in the passive, the imperfect tenses cannot be formed except for a few verbs, and then only in the past and present, and in two ways,—“the house is building,” or “the house is being built;” “the books were printing,” or “were being printed.” Formerly the first of these forms was different. Ex. The ark was preparing.

28. Adjectives. There are no changes of forms in the adjectives, to show their relations to the nouns they qualify, as to gender, number, or case. Ex. A wise man, wise men; a tall man, a tall woman, a tall tree; they saw the powerful king's golden crown; he defeated three great emperors' vast armies. But the degree of intensity in which any quality is regarded as characterizing one or more persons or things, when compared with others, is expressed by the addition of er (or r) and est (or st) to the simple (or positive) form of the adjective;—the former (called the comparative degree) being employed where only two subjects are compared, the latter (named the superlative) when a subject is compared with more than one other in respect of the same quality. Ex. This tree is taller than that, but the next is the tallest of the three, and those trees are the tallest in the wood; this man is wiser than those, and those men are the wisest in our country; platinum is the heaviest metal, or platinum is heavier than any other metal.

Instead of using these inflexions, with adjectives of more than one syllable, the comparative is frequently formed by prefixing more, and the superlative by prefixing most, to the simple form. Ex. A more prudent man, the most prudent conduct; more seasonable weather, most unseasonable importunities.

29. Some adjectives are defective, or have comparatives and superlatives formed from other words; and some do not form them according to the common rule. The following are the principal adjectives to which these remarks apply:—

Bad	worse (worser)	worst
Far	farther	farthest
Fore	further	furthest, first
Good	better	best
Late	later, latter	latest, last
Little	less, lesser	least
Much, many	more	most
Near, nigh	nearer, nigher	nearest, next.
Old	older, elder	oldest, eldest.

Another class of adjectives differs from the common rule in having a positive sig-nification with the comparative form (as is the case with the comparatives, superior, inferior, exterior, and interior, borrowed from the Latin), and only a superlative degree of comparison beside. Ex. Former, foremost; hinder, hindmost, and hindermost; hither, hithermost; inner, inmost, and innermost; nether, nethermost; outer, outmost, and outermost; under, undermost; upper, upmost, and uppermost; utter, utmost, and uttermost. The following superlatives also occur: midmost for midst, northernmost and southernmost.

Different degrees of intensity are also more generally expressed by the use of some adverbs. Ex. Too hot, very cold, exceedingly angry. “Less” and “least” are employed when the comparison regards lower degrees of intensity. Ex. Less scrupulous, least scrupulous.

30. Numerals. When the cardinal numerals are employed to signify abstract numbers, they are nouns. Ex. Four and three are seven, two and one are three. But when used to express concrete quantities they are adjectives. Ex. Four horses, ten men, a hundred pounds.

The ordinal numerals (which signify position in a series) are most frequently adjectives. Ex. The first man, the tenth sheep, the thirtieth day. But they are sometimes used objectively, and then are adverbs. Ex. He stands first, I am tenth on the list. There are also the regularly formed adverbial ordinal numerals, firstly, secondly, thirdly, &c.

Fractional numerals are the same as ordinals, but they are nouns, and are so because they are abbreviations. Ex. One-third (for “one third part”), three-fourths (for “three fourth parts”), four-fifths, two-tenths of an inch. In this series, first is omitted, half is used for second, and quarter is often substituted for fourth.

Beside these there are the reiterative numerals, once, twice, thrice, four times, &c.; the multiplicatives, single, double or twofold, triple or threefold, quadruple or fourfold, &c.;—the distributives, singly or one by one, two by two, &c., and other classes.

The words neither, either, other, both, next, again, then, and some others, which are also called pronouns, are frequently employed as numerals, to signify not one, one, second, two, secondly, &c.

Indeterminate numerals express number and quantity, but not definitely. They are such words as more, some, none, few, many, several, much, all, &c.

31. Pronouns.—Those which are used as nouns only are the personal pronouns, I, thou, he, she, it, and their plurals. They are thus declined.

	FIRST PERSON.		SECOND PERSON.
	Sing.	Plur.	Sing.	Plur.
Nominative Case,	I	we	thou	you, ye
Objective Case,	me	us	thee	you, ye
Possessive Case,	my, mine	our, ours	thy, thine	your, yours
	THIRD PERSON.
	Masc.	Fem.	Neut.	Plur.
Nominative Case,	he	she	it	All genders.
Objective Case,	him	her	it	they
Possessive Case,	his	her, hers	its	them
				their, theirs

The possessive cases of these pronouns are sometimes spoken of as a class by themselves, and called possessive (adjective) pronouns. In the first and second persons, the possessive cases, and in the third person, the objective cases, with self or selves affixed, constitute the reflective pronouns. Ex. Know thyself, he loves himself, they were ashamed of themselves. And these and the possessives are rendered emphatic by the insertion of own. Ex. "I scarcely have coveted what was my own;" "Thou owest unto me even thine own self."

32. The demonstrative pronouns are this and that, with the plurals these and those; such, the same, yon and yonder, here, there, hence, thence, then, &c., most of which are adverbs. Ex. "This same shall comfort us," "after this or that determinate manner," "it makes a greater show in these months than in those," "such are the cold Riphean race, and such the savage Scythian," "darkness there might well seem twilight here," "now shaves with level wing the deep, then soars," "useless and thence ridiculous," "yon flowing arbours, yonder alleys green." The, commonly called the definite article, is properly a demonstrative pronoun.

Pronouns used in questions, called interrogative, and those used in subjective and adjective accessory sentences, called relative, are who (in the objective whom, and the possessive whose, in both numbers), which (occasionally with a possessive case, whose), what, where, whither, whence, when, how; some of them being adverbs. Ex. Who art thou? Which is it? What do you mean? "Whose dog are you?" "Whom dost thou serve?" "Whence come you?" "Whither goest thou?" "How can these things be?" "The son of Duncan, from whom the tyrant holds the due of birth, lives in the English court." "The handsel or earnest of that which is to come." "See what natures accompany the several colours." "In Lydia born, where plenteous harvests the fat fields adorn." "Grateful t' acknowledge whence his good descends." "I strayed I knew not whither." Note, that the relative pronoun what is in signification equivalent to the, that, or those which.

33. Whoever, whosoever (and whomsoever, whossoever), whichever, whichever, whosoever, whatsoever, wherever, whencesoever, however, herein, therein, therefore, wherefore, whereof, whereas, &c., are compounded or contracted pronouns and pronominal phrases. Ex. "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." "I think myself beholden, whoever shows me my mistakes." "Whomsoever else they visit, with the diligent only do they stay." "In whatsoever shape he lurk, I'll know." "Thy very stones prate of my whereabout." "You do take the means whereby I live." "Herein is a wonderful thing," "Howbeit, this wisdom saved them not."

In addition to these various classes of pronouns, there are some which are called indefinite, such as one, aught, naught, (sometimes spelt ought, nought), each, every, either, neither, any, other (which has a plural when used as a noun, but not when used attributively), they (when used to signify "people in general"), &c. Ex. "One may be little the wiser for reading," "for aught that I can understand," "it cometh to naught," "are there any with you?" "the virtue and force of every of these three is shrewdly allayed," "they say that he has died immensely rich."

34. Adverbs.—These words do not admit of inflexion, and of them some are found only in the adverbial form, others are used as prepositions or conjunctions also; some are pronouns or adjectives; and many are derived from adjectives and even from substantives.

They are employed to express the relations of place,—as here, there, where, hither, thither, whither, hence, thence, whence, above, below, before, behind, in, out, off, on, near, afar, backwards, forwards, aside, &c.,—of time, as then, when, now, after, before, still, soon, already, lately, daily, hitherto, &c.,—of manner, as how, thus, so, as, otherwise, well, fluently, kindly, blindly, lovingly, bravely, brightly, &c.,—of mood, as yes, no, not, if, perhaps, probably, possibly, likely, really, &c.,—of degree or intensity, as frequently, seldom, often, again, very, quite, even, nearly, only, too, almost, much, rather, once, twice, thrice, &c.,—of causality, as wherefore, therefore, however, nevertheless, &c.

Some of those of manner, degree, and mood, admit of degrees of comparison, which they form after the manner of adjectives. Ex. Soon, sooner, soonest, bravely, more bravely, most bravely.

35. Prepositions. These also are uninflected words; and beside the prepositions, properly so called, nouns, adjectives, verbs, participles, and adverbs, and even combinations of words, are employed as prepositions. Almost all the real prepositions admit of being used to express every variety of relation between the predicate and its objects, and between a subject and its attributes; but originally they all expressed the relation of place alone.

The prepositions, properly so called, and other words used for prepositions, are such as above, about, across, after, against, along, among, at, before, behind, beside, between, beyond, by, concerning, down, during, from, in, into, of, off, on, over, save, since, through, till, to, towards, up, upon, with, &c.

The following are some of the combinations of words employed as prepositions:—because of, by means of, on account of, in behalf of, instead of, according to, adjacent to, contrary to, with respect to, &c.

Verbs frequently have prepositions as affixes, to modify their signification; and sometimes prepositions are used as adverbial objects in our language, which in other tongues are compounded with the verb. Ex. He undertook that business willingly; they have overcome their enemies; what would I not undergo for you? "they went over to the enemy;" "the poet passes it over as hastily as he can;" "to set forth great things by small;" "I shall set out for London to-morrow."

36. Conjunctions, like adverbs and prepositions, are indeclinable words. Some words are used only as conjunctions, and

EX.—NO ENEMY EITHER HAS, OR EVER SHALL, TAKE MARCUS BRUTUS ALIVE.

KEY.—NO ENEMY HAS TAKEN, OR EVER SHALL TAKE, MARCUS BRUTUS ALIVE.

are called conjunctions proper; others are really pronouns, adverbs, &c.

Coördinative conjunctions are simply copulative, as and, also, besides, moreover, too, not only—but also, both—and, as well as, neither—nor, then, &c.; adversative, as else, either—or, not—but, on the contrary, still, nevertheless, &c.; or causative, as therefore, hence, so, consequently, for, accordingly. Subordinative conjunctions connect adverbial and subjective accessory sentences with their principal sentences; and are such as that, but that, but, whether, if, since, although, unless, so, when, while, whilst, where, whence, &c.

37. Amongst these indeclinable classes of words, may be found many very interesting examples of ancient forms and inflexions of the English language, some of which have been lost in all but these instances, and in these the original signification is no longer preserved. Ex. Possessive cases, else, unawares, needs; dative cases, seldom, whilom; neuter objective cases, little, less, well, nigh, athwart; comparative degrees, after, yonder, over, ere; superlative degrees, erst, next, almost.

Note, that indeclinable words, which are used only as adverbs, prepositions, conjunctions, and interjections, are frequently called particles;—and also, that the direct affirmative, yes, and the direct negative, no, are by some grammarians placed in a distinct class, as not being properly adverbs.

38. SYNTAX.—For the purpose of rendering this compendium of English Grammar more serviceable in such a study as that recommended in the first part, the examples in illustration of the Syntax are taken from casually opened pages of the English Bible, Shakspeare, the quotations in Dr. Johnson's English Dictionary, and one or two other books. In the same manner, the student should select examples by way of exercise, and to demonstrate to himself that he understands the grammatical principles exhibited here.

Words are combined in the formation of sentences in three ways; as subjects and predicates, as attributives to subjects, and as objects to predicates. And sentences are combined coördinately, or subordinately; subordinate or accessory sentences occupying the positions of nouns, adjectives, or adverbs, in the principal sentences of which they form part.

39. Subject and Predicate.—In every sentence or perfectly expressed thought, these two elements are absolutely requisite,—some person or thing spoken of, or a subject, and something asserted respecting it, or a predicate. If either subject or predicate be wanting, the expression in itself is unintelligible.

For subjects, nouns (which stand for persons or things) or pronouns (used in the place of nouns, and always in the nominative case), adjectives, participles or infinitive moods (representing qualities, actions, &c.), single words or letters (in which the thing and the name are identical), or subjective accessory sentences,—may be used. Ex. "All tongues speak of him," "action is eloquence," "my praises made the first a soldier," "you are a traitor," "here he comes," "they say, she's mad," "the dead shall rise and live again," "the wise shall inherit glory," "in him sparing would show a worse sin than its doctrine," "to err is human, to forgive divine," "who is now used in relation to persons, and which to things," "A has, in the English language, three different sounds," "that you have wronged me, doth appear in this," "who steals my purse, steals trash," "for a holy person to be humble is as hard as for a prince to submit himself to tutors."

The strictly impersonal verbs have no subject expressed. Ex. "Methinks already I your tears survey," "methought I saw the grave where Laura lay." Actions or conditions which are not assignable to any subject, have the pronoun it, as a formal subject. Ex. "It thunders, it lightens," "it snows at the top of them, oftener than it rains," "it was freezing," "it is very cold," "it is hot to-day," "it seems." And similarly, for the sake of emphasis or animation, it and there are used formally as subjects, the real subjects being placed after their predicates. Ex. "It is excellent to have a giant's strength, but it is tyrannous to use it as a giant," "it is good to be here," "it is I," "it was you who did this," "it behoved him to suffer," "it is said that parliament is dissolved," "it repented the Lord that he had made man," "it doth not yet appear what we shall be," "there be many that say," "there was in a city a judge," "once upon a time there lived a man," "there arose a mighty famine in that land," "there were that thought it a part of Christian charity to instruct them."

40. The essential characteristic of the predicate being assertion, a verb is indispensable in this part of a sentence. But beside verbs of all kinds, the verb to be, with nouns or pronouns (and that not only in the nominative case, but in the possessive also, and in the objective with a preposition), adjectives, participles, the infinitive mood, adverbs (and adverbs with prepositions), single words or letters, and accessory sentences, may be used as predicates. In the latter cases, the form of the verb to be, which is employed, is called the copula, or link, which unites the predicate to the subject. Ex. "He ran this way, and leaped this orchard wall," "he hath hid himself among those trees," "I'll believe thee," "Juliet is the sun," "I am a villain," "you'll be the bear," "her mother is the lady of the house," "ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's," "oh, he is even in my mistress' case, just in her case," "the haughty prelate, with many more confederates, are in arms," "of noble race was Shenkin," "they were to the number of three hundred horse," "they shall be mine," "you shall be ours," "he is not of us," "the sky is red," "you are meek," "you are excused," "they are running this way," "you are not to be taught," "the holy treasure was to be reserved," "the woman will be out," "ye are from beneath," "the preterit of creep is crept," "the ending of the genitive case is s," "this is what I said," "thou art whom I fear," "men should be what they seem." Nevertheless, in poetry and oratory, when peculiar emphasis or

EX.—WHEREFORE THAT FIELD WAS CALLED THE FIELD OF BLOOD UNTO THIS DAY.

KEY.—WHEREFORE THAT FIELD HAS BEEN CALLED UNTO THIS DAY THE FIELD OF BLOOD.

effect is desired, the copula is omitted, and the other predicative word placed before the subject. Ex. "Vain, all in vain, the weary search;" "sweet the moments, rich in blessing."

The connexion between the predicate and the subject in a sentence is shown by the predicate being in the same number as the subject. Ex. He loves, they love, the tree falls, trees grow, I am afraid, we are satisfied. Two or more singular subjects connected by the conjunction "and" (which, however, is often omitted), so as to form either a compound or a single subject, have their predicate in the plural. Ex. "Bacon and Shakspeare are the greatest geniuses that England has produced;" "now abide faith, hope, charity;" "one and one are two." And similarly, collective nouns have their predicates in the singular when they are thought of in the aggregate, but the plural when their component parts are most regarded. Ex. "Parliament is sitting," "a cluster of mob were making themselves merry with their betters," "the people are the city," "my people doth not consider." But when the predicate is a singular noun, the copula is often singular. Ex. "Bread and cheese is fit diet for a prince." And when the conjunction or or nor is used, unless the last subject be plural, the predicate is singular. Ex. "Either you or your brother has deceived me," "neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat," "either he or they have carried her off."

41. When the speaker makes the assertion respecting himself, the subject is a personal pronoun of the first person, and the verb is also in the first person; when the assertion is addressed to him, respecting whom it is made, the personal pronoun of the second person, and the form of the verb to correspond with it, are employed; and when it relates to any other person or thing, the third person of the verb (with the pronoun to correspond, if requisite), is used. Ex. "I, that speak unto thee, am he," "I know in whom I have believed," "we speak that we do know," "thou art the man," "thou knewest that I was an austere man," "ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep," "Hamlet, thou hast thy father much offended."—Mother, you have my father much offended." "He planteth an ash, and the rain doth nourish it," "he drinketh no water, and is faint," "the great duke came to the bar," "gentlemen, the penance lies on you," "heavenly blessings follow such creatures," "the hearts of princes kiss obedience, so much they love it." In commands, the subject is very commonly omitted. Ex. "Observe, observe, he is moody," "believe it, this is true," "pray hear me." The subject is also very frequently omitted in animated discourse, before the verbs pray, please, &c., when used in accessory sentences. Ex. "Pray hear me," "give it me, please."

42. When the assertion is general, or refers to the time at which it is made generally, the present indefinite sense is used. Ex. "Man wants but little here below." "I am the most unhappy woman living." "My lords, you speak your pleasures. What he deserves of you and me, I know; what we can do to him (though now the time gives way to us) I much fear." When it refers to the actual point of time at which the assertion is made, the present imperfect is used. Ex. "The duke is coming," "his grace is entering," "from all parts they are coming," "England is not wanting in a learned nobility." And when it is made respecting an action regarded at the time as completed, the present perfect is employed. Ex. "I have heard one of the greatest geniuses this age has produced," "the gods have placed labour before interest," "this observation we have made on man." The present perfect sometimes appears with a different auxiliary. Ex. "I am come, they are gone." "Cardinal Campeius is stolen away to Rome." The indefinite tense is frequently used instead of the imperfect. Ex. "He bites his lip, and starts, stops on a sudden, looks upon the ground." And the present perfect is sometimes employed to indicate past time, or in a sense equivalent to that of the past indefinite tense. Ex. "We have done that which it was our duty to do," "we have heard with our ears, and our fathers have declared unto us the noble works thou didst in their days."

In animated historical narrative, and in narrative poetry, the present indefinite is often employed. Ex. "The boy starts to his feet, and his keen eye looks along the ready rifle . . . Lo! a deer from Dalness, hound-driven, or sullenly astray, slowly bearing his antlers up the glen, then stopping for a moment to snuff the air, then away—away! The rifle-shot rings dully from the scarce echoing snow-cliff, and the animal leaps aloft struck by a certain but not sudden death-wound."

"Her lover sinks—she sheds no ill-timed tears;

Her chief is slain—she fills his fatal post;
Her fellows flee—she checks their base career;

Her foe retires—she heads the sallying host.

"My General descends to the outer staircase, and harangues: once more in vain. . . Lafayette mounts the white charger; and again harangues, and reharangues, . . . so lasts it, hour after hour, for the space of half a day."

43. In like manner, actions, &c., are referred to the past generally, or as proceeding and incomplete, or as completed, by the use of the past indefinite, imperfect, and perfect tenses. Ex. "My father loved you, he said he did," "I thrice presented him a kingly crown," "you wronged yourself;" "they of Bethshemesh were reaping," "Israel were fighting with the Philistines," "they were eating, and drinking, and dancing;" "when Boaz had eaten and drunk, he went to lie down," "Elihu had waited till Job had spoken." The emphatic form is commonly used interchangeably with the indefinite. Ex. "Thus did my master bid me kneel, and thus he bade me say." The indefinite is often employed definitely when any particular past time is indicated in the sentence. Ex. "I saw him yesterday."

And in the same way actions, &c., in time become discriminated by the employment of the future indefinite, imperfect,

EX.—IT WAS UNCERTAIN IF THE FRENCH WERE IN POSSESSION OF THE TOWN.

KEY.—IT WAS UNCERTAIN WHETHER THE FRENCH WERE IN POSSESSION OF THE TOWN.

and perfect senses. Ex. "A weighty secret will work a hole through them," "he will not stoop till he falls," "I shall never forget;"—"thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power," "they will be still praising thee;"—"we shall have completed our task before you commence yours," "then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God." Instead of the future, the indefinite present is often used. Ex. I leave England to-morrow, we sail next week. Other forms for expressing future time are mentioned above. Ex. "We are going to spend some time on the continent," "I was about to write."

44. When simple assertion, or denial, is intended, the predicate is always in the indicative mood. Ex. "I am glad to see your lordship abroad," "the mouse gnawed the threads to pieces, and set the lion at liberty," "he goeth in company with the workers of iniquity, and walketh with wicked men," "you did wish that I would wake her then," "she may go to bed when she list; all is as she will," "thou must run to him," "flatter him it may, I confess."

In principal sentences, when a wish is to be expressed, or a concession to be made for the sake of argument, the subjunctive mood is used. Ex. "Now, all my joy trace the conjunction!" "the Lord forbid!" "the Lord increase this business!" "be it so, my argument remains unshaken."

Commands are conveyed by means of the imperative mood. Ex. "Know thyself," "follow thou me," "cease to do evil, learn to do well," "rejoice, you men of Angiers, ring your bells." The auxiliary let is employed for the first and third persons. Ex. "Acknowledge then the king, and let me in," "let none of them escape," "rise, let us go," "let the soldiers seize him," "let Euclid rest, and Archimedes pause," "let him be known among the heathens."

45. The distinction between the use of the active and the passive forms of verbs has been pointed out and illustrated above (p. 11); and from that it will appear that whatever has been said here respecting predicates applies as much to the latter as to the former, with this exception,—there being no (or but few) imperfect tenses in the passive, the indefinite tenses are in all cases (except the few referred to) used to express actions still in progress, or incomplete. Ex. "The colours are changed by viewing them at different obliquities," "I am determined to prove a villain," "you shall be new christened in the town," "to that sweet region was our voyage bent," "Hector was dragged about the walls of Troy," "the Irish horseboys should be cut off," "after all that can be said against it, this remains true," "it may be occasioned thus," "it shall be reported to the king," "the Presbyterian sect was established in all its forms," "it was said, that the elder should serve the younger."

46. In questions the same grammatical forms are employed as in assertions; but the order of the words is generally inverted, and when compound tenses are used (as they most frequently are), the subject follows the auxiliary, whilst the verb itself occupies its usual place. Interrogative pronouns are put at the beginning of questions. Ex. "Where is he?" "Shall I live in hope?" "What, do you tremble, are you all afraid?" "Saw you the king to-day?" "When have I injured thee?" "Why look you so pale?" "Who hath believed our report?" "To whom will ye liken God?" "Lucentio is your name?" "What, you mean my face?" "You saw this, and opposed it not?"

The grammatical construction of negative sentences differs not at all from that of affirmative ones, such as have been chiefly selected for examples; the relation of the negative words no, not, &c., being either that of the attributive to its subject, or of the object of manner to its predicate, as may be seen below.

47. Subject and attributive.—In order to describe the subjects respecting which assertions are made in sentences, more accurately than their mere names are sufficient to do; and to define them, so that the assertions may not become ambiguous by reason of the vagueness of the subjects they relate to; words, phrases, and accessory sentences are employed, which are called attributives.

The commonest attributives are adjectives; with which may be included participles (which are the adjective forms of verbs), numerals, some kinds of pronouns, nouns used as adjectives, and a few adverbs, which are also occasionally used attributively. The only sign of the relation between these attributives and their subjects is their position, which is immediately before the words they refer to, except in cases where peculiar emphasis or animation is aimed at, when they immediately follow their subjects. Ex. "The weird sisters," "my dread exploits," "from this moment," "my dearest coz," "my pretty cousin," "to offer up a weak, poor, innocent lamb," "O nation miserable!" "a most miraculous work in this good king," "thy royal father was a more sainted king," "each several crime," "many ways," "the healing benediction," "all my pretty chickens," "an accustomed action," "curses not loud, but deep," "those linen cheeks of thine are counsellors to fear," "a rooted sorrow," "the written troubles of the brain," "what wood is this?" "within this three mile," "a moving grove," "lead our first battle," "hateful to mine ear," "thou shalt have none assurance of thy life," "there was no day like that before," "it is no good report that I hear," "in that very day his thoughts perish," "to poor we thine enmity's most capital," "a hundred altars in her temple smoke, a thousand bleeding hearts her power invoke," "some men with swords may reap the field," "see where the victor victim bleeds," "his knowledge of good lost," "man's first disobedience," "these are the martyr spirits of mankind," "which way went he?" "what man is he?" "on the hither side," "yon flowery arbours, yonder alleys green," "in russet gear and honest kersey hose," "a hundred upon poor four us!" "an everlasting now."

In some cases where a noun is compounded with an attributive word, in the

EX.—LADIES, THERE IS NOT ONE OF YOU THAT UNDERGO THIS TORTURE.

KEY.—LADIES, THERE IS NOT ONE OF YOU THAT UNDERGOES THIS TORTURE.

plural number, the noun assumes the plural form. Ex. Attorney general, Attorneys general; Lord lieutenant, Lords lieutenant. But where the compound word expresses an inseparable notion, the plural ending is added to the attributive, if that is the second element in the word. Ex. Two spoonfuls.

48. Nouns and pronouns in the possessive case are exceedingly common as attributives. But it must be noted that there is no distinction between the possessive cases of personal pronouns, and certain adjective pronouns called possessive; examples of which are given in the preceding paragraph. Sometimes the subject to these attributives is omitted; and frequently the preposition of is inserted before the possessive case. Ex. "I am not yet of Percy's mind," "the roaring of the lion's whelp," "a herald's coat without sleeves," "hearts no bigger than pins' heads," "I did pluck allegiance from men's hearts," "a fair queen in a summer's bower," "I must to the barber's, monsieur," "the knight came to the tailor's," "I saw thee late at the Count Orsino's," "which is the way to Master Jew's?" "let ours also learn to maintain good works," "I seek not yours but you," "the king is now in progress towards St Alban's;"—"a friend of mine on his journey," "if e'er those eyes of yours behold another day," "a seal-ring of my grandfather's," "this dotage of our general's overflows the measure."

49. The objective case of nouns and pronouns, with various prepositions, but especially with the preposition of (which combination is equivalent to the possessive case), is used attributively. Ex. "I speak in behalf of my daughter, in the minority of them both," "the wicked ministry of arms," "the instrument of Providence," "the customs of the Irish," "thou art a soul in bliss," "a wholesome law time out of mind," "compassion on the king commands me stoop," "travels by sea and land," "the messenger from our sister," "our duty to God," "sons to Cymbeline," "four rogues in buckram." Imperfect participles are also employed with the preposition of, as attributives. Ex. "A famine of hearing the word of the Lord," "he hath a bad habit of frowning," "the greatest care of fulfilling the Divine will." Another attributive use of this preposition (with one or two others) with nouns and pronouns, is called partitive, from its evident force and signification. Ex. "the most diminutive of birds," "I have peppered two of them," "seven of the eleven, I paid," "every one of them," "all of us," "it contained the whole of religion," "for which of these works do ye stone me?" "one amongst a thousand."

50. Subjects are further defined and described by means of the words expressing subjects, in the same number, and immediately preceding or following them, and said to be in apposition with them. Ex. "Fulvia thy wife came first into the field, against my brother Lucius," "the false house-wife Fortune," "thou, my brother, my competitor, my mate in empire, friend and companion in the part of war," "King Cophetua wooed the beggar maid,"

"Hamlet, Prince of Denmark," His royal highness, Prince Albert; Lord John Russell, Mr Smith. When several persons of the same name are spoken of, or addressed by letter, the honorary title is put in the plural, whilst the name is in the singular number. Ex. Messieurs Smith, Cheeryble Brothers, the Mesdames Robinson. In some cases the noun in apposition is connected by means of the preposition of. Ex. The empire of Russia, the city of St. Petersburg, the university of Cambridge, the county of Kent, the port of London, the month of July, the province of Judea.

When two nouns in apposition are attributives to another, the latter only is put into the possessive case. Ex. "Our neighbour Shepherd's son," "King Henry's head," "Dr. Johnson's Dictionary," "Duke Humphrey's deeds," "the Lord Protector's wife," "my Lord Cardinal's man," "Saint Alban's shrine."

Accessory sentences are employed as attributives. Ex. "Whose hand is that the forest bear doth lick? Not his that spoils her young before her face," "a day will come, when York shall claim his own," "in that chair, where kings and queens are crowned."

51. Many of the illustrations given above show how common it is for a single subject to be described and defined by means of many attributives. The following examples will show some of the ways in which the repetition of the same word as subject to several attributives, or as attributive to several subjects, is prevented. Ex. "I thought the king had more affected the Duke of Albany than Cornwall," "the princes, France and Burgundy," "here I disclaim all . . . propinquity, and property of blood, and as a stranger to my heart and me, hold thee," "we still retain the name and all the additions to a king," "thy dowerless daughter is queen of us, of ours, and our fair France," "he wrote this but as an essay or taste of my virtue," "menaces and maledictions against king and nobles," "the marks of sovereignty, knowledge and reason," "my train are men of choice and rarest parts," "the messengers from our sister and the king," "he, the sacred honour of himself, his queen's, his hopeful son's, his babe's, betrays to slander," "uncles of Glo'ster and of Winchester," "the Dukes of Orleans, Calaber, Bretaigne, and Alençon."

52. Predicate and Object.—The signification of predicates is modified or completed by means of words, phrases, and accessory sentences, which are called objects. And not only are all parts of verbs followed by these adjuncts, but adjectives also frequently require them.

Objects which complete or supplement the meaning of their predicates are of three kinds;—(1.) the immediate or direct object of the predicate; (2.) the remoter, or mediate and indirect object; (3.) the remotest object, or that which indicates the effect or result of what is asserted in the predicate. Ex.

1st obj.	2nd obj.	3rd obj.
"I will take you	to me	for a people."
"This opinion gave
2nd obj.	1st obj.	3rd obj.
them	courage	to all adventures."
Those which modify or attemper the signification of their predicates are six in number;—(1.) Those which indicate the cause or origin of whatever is asserted in the predicate; (2.) those which tell its design or purpose; (3.) those which declare the means by which it is brought about; (4.) those which show the manner of its existence or action; (5.) and (6.) those indicating the time and place of its occurrence. It must, however, be observed, that it is not easy in all instances to determine to which class an object belongs,—those expressing cause, purpose, or means frequently being distinguishable by exceedingly evanescent characteristics. But this is not, practically, either inconvenient or productive of ambiguity; as may be seen in the examples of these and other kinds of objects. Ex. (1.) "My soul grows sad with troubles;" "by that sin fell the angels." (2.) "She went to glean Palæmon's fields;" "one man pursues power in order to wealth, and another wealth in order to power." (3.) "Judge the event by what has passed;" "the strong through pleasure falls soonest." (4.) "They act wisely;" "beware, and govern well thy appetite." (5.) "We lacked your counsel and your help to-night;" "it hath been sung at festivals, on ember eves, and holy ales." (6.) "The lion's foe lies prostrate on the plain;" "I am with thee, by and before, about and in thee too."

53. Nouns, pronouns, and other words used as nouns,—such as the infinitive mood of verbs, and participles,—most commonly without, but also with prepositions before them, serve as immediate objects of predicates; and also of the infinitive mood of verbs, and participles, and of adjectives, when they are not the predicates of sentences. And the personal pronouns, whether with or without prepositions, are in the objective case. Ex. "Do you not hear him?" "you mar our labour;" "keep your cabins;" "you do assist the storm;" "t is time I should inform thee further;" "wipe thou thine eyes; have comfort;" "you have often begun to tell me what I am, but stopped and left me to a bootless inquisition;" "he whom, next thyself, of all the world I loved, and to him put the manage of my state;" "the government I cast upon my brother;" "the ivy which had hid my princely trunk, and sucked the verdure out on't;" "triumphing over death, and chance, and time;" "on mine arm shall they trust;" "victorious over temptation."

The common exclamations "ah me!" and "woe is me!" are contractions; the latter was originally, "woe becomes or befits me," and the former is equivalent to it in meaning, and may have been derived from it.

54. The more remote object is also expressed by nouns, and most commonly preceded by the preposition to; but this is often omitted; and there are other prepositions which serve to connect this object with its predicate. Whenever the remote object is expressed, but the immediate object left out, the sense is imperfect. The personal pronouns, as in the last, are always in the objective case. Ex. "Three great ones of the city oft eapp'd to him;"

"whip me such honest knaves;" "throwing but shows of service on their lords, do themselves homage;" "I am beholden to you;" "forgive us our trespasses;" "he makes a supper, and a great one, to many lords and ladies;" "I need not add more fuel to your fire;" "comparing spiritual things with spiritual;" "I have charged thee not to haunt about my doors;" "fetch me an iron crow;" "O continue thy loving-kindness unto me;" "the services, which I have done the signiory;" "the goodness of the night upon you, friends;" "I'll refer me, to all things of sense;" "good-night to every one!" "it cannot be that Desdemona should long continue her love to the Moor, nor he his to her;" "I have told thee often and I re-tell thee again and again, I hate the Moor."

55. For the remotest object, which expresses the result or effect of the predicate, nouns (with or without prepositions, or preceded by the conjunction as), pronouns, adjectives, participles, the infinitive mood of verbs, and to be with nouns, adjectives, and adverbs, are employed. Ex. "He, in good time, must his lieutenant be, and I, his Moorship's ancient;" "the king, your father, was reputed for a prince most prudent;" "whom I hold my most malicious foe, and think not at all a friend to truth;" "bade me enjoy it;" "man became a living soul;" "why should damage grow to the hurt of the king?" "they looked upon themselves as the happiest people of the universe;" "things were just ripe for a war;" "those pearls of dew she wears prove to be presaging tears;" "his servants ye are to whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness;" "we take a falling meteor for a star;" "it were not for your quiet, nor your good, nor for my manhood, honesty, and wisdom, to let you know my thoughts;" "I believe him to be a very honest man;" "whom do you suppose it to be?"

56. Of the objects which modify the meaning of the predicate, those which do so by indicating its origin or cause are expressed by nouns (and all words and combinations of words that can be used instead of them), preceded by certain prepositions, and by some adverbs. Oaths are included under this head, as indicating the ground of the assertion, though not of what is asserted. Ex. "I would not follow him then;" "therefore to our best merey give yourselves;" "whom from the flow of gall I name not, but from sincere motions;" "you lost your office on the complaint of the tenants;" "men are pleased with variety;" "astonished at the voice, he stood;" "they were jealous of her beauty;" "guilty of high treason;" "I can tell you why;" "thou hast forced me out of thy honest truth to play the woman;" they boast themselves of idols;" "Sempronius gives no thanks on this account;" "you are good, but from a nobler cause, from your own knowledge, not from nature's laws;" "by the faith of a man, I know my prince;" "by heaven, I rather would have been his hangman;" "on my honour, it is so."

57. Those objects which point out the design and purpose of the predicate are expressed by the infinitive mood of verbs, most commonly, and also by nouns, &c., with prepositions. Ex. "I follow him to serve my turn upon him;" "wears out his time for nought but provender;" "in following him, I follow but myself, not I for love and duty, but seeming so, for my peculiar end;" "I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him;" "he travelled the world, on purpose to converse with the most learned men;" "with this design I have visited all the most celebrated schools in Europe;" "he writes not for money, nor for praise;" "there is a time to weep, and a time to laugh;" "be swift to hear, slow to speak;" "one man pursues power in order to wealth, and another wealth in order to power;" "thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him."

58. Objects by which the means employed in producing any result are declared are generally expressed by nouns, &c., with prepositions. Ex. "I must be be-lee'd and calm'd by debtor and creditor, this counter-caster;" "preferment goes by letter and affection, not by the old gradation;" "plague him with flies;" "we may outrun by violent swiftness that which we run at, and lose by overrunning;" "my soul grows sad with troubles;" "the strong through pleasure soonest falls, the weak through smart;" "you must think we hope to gain by you;" "thus, by the music we may know when noble wits a-hunting go;" "you absolved him with an axe;" "some he killed with his gun, others by poison."

59. Manner is expressed by adjectives, participles, adverbs, and nouns, &c., with prepositions or the conjunction as. Ex. "He, as loving his own pride and purposes, evades them, with a bombast circumstance;" "wears out his time, much like his master's ass;" "wide was spread their fame in ages past;" "in madness, being full of supper and distempering draughts, dost thou come to start my quiet;" "he, with his father, is going home;" "a Puritan amongst them sings psalms to hornpipes;" "we are not to stay all together, but to come by him, where he stands, by ones, by twos, and by threes;" "seize her by force, and bear her hence unheard;" "so frown'd the mighty combatants;" "thus he spake;" "quit yourselves like men;" "ye shall be as gods;" "come quickly;" "he answered well;" "they that sow in tears, shall reap in joy;" "he that goeth forth weeping, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him;" "they act wisely."

60. All the various ways in which objects indicate the time of an action, &c., are expressed by nouns, &c., with or without prepositions, adjectives, participles, and adverbs. Ex. "He in good time must his lieutenant be;" "we rose both at an instant, and fought a long hour by Shrewsbury clock;" "then have sat the livelong day;" "he came by night;" "doomed for a certain time to walk the night, and for the day confined to fast in fires;" "he did them meditate all his life long;" "till then, who knew the force of those dire arms?" "I have not wept this forty years;" "morning by morning shall it pass over;" "yet in her sanguine gown by night and day;" "depart immediately;" "I was never pleased;" "thy servants' trade hath been about cattle from our youth even until now;" "sometimes walking;" "now is the time."

61. Place, where, and direction, whence and whither, are expressed by nouns, &c., with or without prepositions, and by adverbs. Ex. "I will wear my heart upon my sleeve;" "his eyes had seen the proof at Rhodes, at Cyprus, and on other grounds;" "proclaim him in the streets;" "I, upon my frontiers here, keep residence;" "I saw hereabout nothing remarkable;" "let them hence away;" "a puissant and mighty power is marching hitherward in proud array;" "if they come to sojourn at my house, I'll not be there;" "darkness there might well seem twilight here;" "ah! where was Eloise?" "the good man is gone a long journey;" "come a little nearer this way;" "the eyes of the Lord are in every place;" "we must measure twenty miles to-day;" "he looked this way and that way;" "come hither, child, to me."

62. Accessory sentences are sentences complete in themselves as to syntax, but occupying subordinate places in other sentences, which stand to them in the relation of principals. They are of three kinds, named (after the offices they discharge in their principal sentences) subjective, attributive, and objective sentences. Their relation to their principals is shown by their position, and by the use of relative pronouns and certain conjunctions, and in many cases by the employment of the subjunctive mood.

63. Subjective accessory sentences are found in every relation in which a noun could stand; and may be either subjects, predicates (both of which have been illustrated above), or completing objects to predicates (with or without prepositions); but being equivalent to nouns, they are named after that part of the sentence which is especially taken by the noun. Ex. "See that thou do it;" "I take it much unkindly, that thou, Iago, should'st know of this;" "thou told'st me, thou didst hold him in thy hate;" "be judge yourself, whether I in any just term am affined to love the Moor;" "right glad I am, he was not in this fray;" "I have forgot why I did call thee back;" "what you would work me to I have some aim;" "mark me with what violence she loved the Moor;" "I could well wish courtesy would invent some other custom of entertainment;" "you must not think, then, that I am drunk;" "what you can make her do, I am content to look on; what to speak, I am content to hear;" "mark what it is his mind aims at in the question, and not what words he expresses;" "she said, Say on;" "as when we say, Plato was no fool."

64. Attributive accessory sentences occur wherever adjectives might be used as attributives. The relation between these sentences and their subjects is shown by their position, by their predicates assuming the same personal forms as those of their subjects, and by the employment of the relative pronouns who, which, and that, in them. Where no confusion is possible, these pronouns may be omitted.)

EX. "Thou, Iago, who hast had my purse ;" "a fellow that never set a squadron in the field, nor the division of a battle knows, more than a spinster ;" "I hold him to be unworthy of his place, that does those things ;" "I fear the trust Othello puts him in will shake this island ;" "honest Iago, that look'st dead with grieving ;" "everyone hears that, which can distinguish sound ;" "that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste brought death into the world ;" "the son of Duncan, from whom this tyrant holds the due of birth ;" "fruits, that blossom first, will first be ripe ;" "he that is of God, heareth God's words ;" "unto me, who am less than the least of all saints ;" "thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God ?" "I, that speak unto thee, am he."

Note, that whether the relative be subject, attributive, or object, in its own sentence, it is always placed at the very commencement of it, because it has so few inflexions, that otherwise its connexion with the subject (or antecedent) it refers to might be obscure.

These sentences frequently stand as attributives to other sentences, which are related to them as subjects. EX. "They shall obey, unless they seek for hatred at my hands, which if they do, they shall feel the vengeance of my wrath ;" "he was unsatisfied in getting, which was a sin ;" "as he spoke, a braying ass did sing most loud and clear, whereat his horse did start."

65. Objective accessory sentences are those which serve instead of objects of cause, purpose, means, manner (including degree or intensity), time, and place ; and those expressing a condition or concession, which are distinguished by the employment of the probable or improbable forms of the subjunctive mood, according to the amount of contingency affecting the condition or concession, and generally after certain conjunctions. The indicative mood is, however, now very commonly used instead ; always, indeed, where no contingency or uncertainty is to be expressed. EX. "Because we come to do you service, you think we are ruffians ;" "since neither love, nor sense of pain, nor force of reason, can persuade, then let example be obeyed ;" "be ye stedfast, immovable . . . forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord ;" "he makes it his care both to write and to speak plainly, so that he may be understood ;" "treat it kindly, that it may wish, at least, with us to stay ;" "judge not, that ye be not judged ;" "as will appear by what follows ;" "from what has been said, you may perceive the hopelessness of your undertaking ;" "be taught by what I am suffering ;" "who, he knew, would be willing ;" "thou hast used my purse, as if the strings were thine ;" "it is as sure as you are Roderigo ;" "throw such changes of vexation on't, as it may lose some colour ;" "the longer I am acquainted with him, the more I like him ;" "so great was the cold, that the deepest rivers were frozen ;" "he is as merry as the day is long ;" "I'll see, before I doubt ;" "kings may take their advantage, when and how they list ;" "use physic, or ever thou be sick ;" "while I was protector, pity was all the fault that was in me ;" "he is the most improved mind, since you saw him, that ever was ;" "where your treasure is, there will your heart be also ;" "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest ;" "I have shown whence the understanding may get all the ideas it has ;" "the noise pursues me, wheresoe'er I go ;" "despise me, if I do not ;" "were I the Moor, I would not be Iago ;" "you will not serve God, if the devil bid you !" "think we, or think we not, time hurries on ;" "thou dost conspire against thy friend, if thou but think'st him wronged, and makest his ear a stranger to thy thoughts ;" "though thou detain me, I will not eat ;" "wert thou an oracle to tell me so, I'd not believe it ;" "had fate so pleased, I had been eldest born ;" "I had been happy, so I had nothing known ;" "unless I look on Sylvia in the day, there is no day for me to look upon ;" "though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor ;" "many things are believed, although they be intricate, obscure, and dark."

66. Contracted and compound sentences.—Two or more sentences having the same subjects, or the same predicates or objects, and two or more subjects having the same attributives, or vice versa, are frequently contracted into one compound sentence, or phrase, by the use of conjunctions. Examples of several kinds may be found in the former parts of this Compendium ; others are such as these. EX. "With fairest flowers, whilst summer lasts, and I live here, Fidele, I'll sweeten thy sad grave ;" "his honesty got him small gains, but shameless flattery, and filthy beverage, and unseemly thrift, and borrow base, and some good lady's gift ;" "it shall ever be my study to make discoveries of this nature in human life, and to settle the proper distinctions between the virtues and perfections of mankind, and those false colours and resemblances of them, that shine alike in the eyes of the vulgar."

In contracted sentences, where a comparison is expressed, care should be taken to avoid ambiguity. EX. "He would make a better soldier than scholar," expresses the greater aptitude of the person spoken of for the arts of war, than for the pursuit of learning. "He would make a better soldier than a scholar," expresses that the person spoken of displays greater aptitude for war than a student would. "He likes them better than I," signifies that his liking for the persons spoken of is greater than my liking for them ; whilst "he likes them better than me" signifies that his liking for them is greater than his liking for me.

Similarly, wherever two or more subjects are distinguished by the attributive adjectives only, unless in cases where no ambiguity can arise, they should be distinguished by the repetition of the demonstrative. EX. "The red and blue vestments were most admired," should be, "the red and the blue vestments," if two kinds are intended. But we may say, "the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, because the attributives are incompatible in their signification.

67. Construction is the arrangement of words in sentences, and of sentences in relation to each other, so as to indicate the subordination of the several parts, and their connexion and union; and the universal rule is—to place the subordinate words, or phrases, before the principal ones. Yet for the sake of imparting special significance to some words or sentences, the form of this rule is often violated, and particularly in poetry. This is called inverted construction, to distinguish it from the ordinary arrangement, which is designated direct.

Ex. Direct. "The orator had the honour of haranguing Pope Clement the Sixth, and the satisfaction of conversing with Petrarch, a congenial mind; but his aspiring hopes were chilled by disgrace and poverty; and the patriot was reduced to a single garment, and the charity of an hospital!" "The apartments, porticoes, and the courts of the Lateran were spread with innumerable tables for either sex, and every condition; a stream of wine flowed from the nostrils of Constantine's brazen horse; no complaint, except the scarcity of water, could be heard; and the licentiousness of the multitude was curbed by discipline and fear."

Inverted. "At last, after much fatigue, through dull roads, and bad weather, we came, with no small difficulty, to our journey's end." "Unto the French, the dreadful judgment-day so dreadful will not be, as was his sight." "So shaken as we are, so wan with care, find we a time for frightened peace to pant." "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" "Fallen, fallen is Babylon, that great city!" "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have, give I unto thee." "Go I must, whatever may ensue." "Up rose the sun, and up rose Emily."

68. Accentuation.—In order to show the subordination of the less important phrases in sentences, to the principal ones in each of the several combinations treated of above, and to give prominence to the most important elements in words, a particular stress of voice (called accent) is customarily laid upon the radical part of all inflected words, and upon the principal words or phrases in each of those combinations. Ex. Golden, disgraceful, gratitude, kingdom, truthfulness, wakeful; they read; the men were astonished, my suspicions were correct; the secrets of the grave this viperous slander enters; the mighty dead; all his golden words are spent; king David; here is one Lucianus, nephew to the king; the kingdom of England; the world hateth you; I joy to meet thee; give the book to me; I crave your pardon.

69. Emphasis is distinguished from accent by this; the latter serves to indicate the connexion of the words, &c., and to give unity to the meanings of the several parts which enter into the different combinations that make up sentences, &c.; whilst emphasis shows some special meaning which the speaker desires to give to his words, and which they would not ordinarily bear. Ex. "Théy read, wé write; the mén were astonished, and the wóman fled; my suspicions were correct, but my knówledge was no more than yours; the kingdom of Éngland, not that of Scótláñd; no, sir, I do not bite my thumb at you, sir; but I bite my thúmb, sir; be not afraid, shé shall not harm thee; I scorn you not, it seems that you scorn mé."

70. Punctuation.—The pauses which, in speaking, are used to impart greater accuracy and clearness to our expressions, in writing are represented by characters called stops; and the notes of interrogation and admiration, the parenthesis and the dash, as well as the breaking up of composition into paragraphs, are employed for similar purposes. In poetry they are more used than in prose; and the fewest number possible should always be employed.

The full point, or period, indicates the termination of a passage which is complete both in meaning and in syntax. The colon marks the end of a grammatical combination, but shows that what follows is required to complete the meaning. The semicolon shows that, both in meaning and in syntax, the expression it follows is incomplete. And the comma is used to distinguish, rather than to divide, the parts of grammatical combinations, so that the connexion between them, and their signification when combined, may be more clear. But where the passages are not very long, and no mistake would arise, the comma is used for the semicolon, and even for the colon; and the semicolon is employed instead of the colon. The period is frequently employed, also, where we should expect only the colon. Ex. "The Roman senators conspired against Julius Cæsar to kill him: that very next morning Artemidorus, Cæsar's friend, delivered him a paper (desiring him to peruse it) wherein the whole plot was discovered: but Cæsar complimented his life away, being so taken up to return the salutations of such people as met him in the way, that he pocketed the paper, among other petitions, as unconcerned therein; and so, going to the Senate-house, was slain."

"The noble Brutus

Hath told you, Cæsar was ambitious:

If it were so, it was a grievous fault;

And grievously hath Cæsar answered it."

71. Parentheses indicate either an explanatory remark, or a thought related to what has been said, which is noted but not pursued; and instead of the common sign, two commas, or two semicolons, or two dashes, are often employed. Ex. "Travelling on the plain (which notwithstanding hath its risings and fallings), I discovered Salisbury steeple many miles off." "I find two (husband and wife), both stealing, and but one of them guilty of felony." "Spill not the morning (the quintessence of the day!) in recreation." "Kaleigh had (besides his own merits) two good friends."

In general the dash is used to show that a pause should be made, because the sense is broken off abruptly; or whilst the sense is not interrupted, something unexpected follows; or to call for greater attention to what is about to be said. Ex.

"To die,—to sleep,—
No more;—and, by a sleep, to say we end
The heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to,—'t is a consummation Devoutly to be wished."

"O thou invisible spirit of wine, if thou hast no name to be known by, let us call thee—devil!"

"Thou art a villain."

"You are—a senator."

"Some people, handsome by nature, have wilfully deformed themselves;—such as wear Bacchus' colours in their faces, arising not from having—but being—bad
livers."

"Romeo, the hate I bear thee can afford
No better term than this—Thou art a villain."

Other artifices are employed in typography to represent some of the effects of the tones and inflexions of the voice in speaking; of which there should be especially mentioned here the use of Italic letters, and of SMALL CAPITALS. But the best writers avoid these; and it is a safe rule, to trust to the force and meaning of what is written, rather than to these or any other typographical contrivances.

72. RHETORIC.—Some modes of expression, called tropical, or figurative,
which are strictly amongst the matters
respecting which rhetoric is conversant, should be noticed here; as they serve to account for some of the forms which have been noticed above.

Personification, or prosopopœia, is the treating of things and subjects without life, even abstractions, as though they were living persons. Ex. "Confusion heard his voice." "I have no spur to prick the sides of my intent, but only vaulting ambition,
which o'erleaps itself." "Doth not wisdom
cry? and understanding put forth her voice?" "Make temperance thy companion, so shall health sit on thy brow."

Ellipsis, or omission, is the suppression of some word, which from the nature of what is spoken of, or from the context,
can be readily supplied. Ex. "All in vain [is] my frantic calling, all in vain [are] my falling tears!" "[There is] no way to fly, nor strength to hold out flight!" "The knight came to the tailor's [shop]." "Are you going to the House [of Parliament]?"

Pleonasm, or redundancy, is the introduction of some words not actually required, but often exceedingly effective, as a means of giving peculiar emphasis, or expressing a particular feeling. Ex. "The skipping king, he ambled up and down."
"They returned back again to the same city from whence they came forth." "The dawn is overcast, the morning lowers, and heavily with clouds brings on the day."

Zeugma, or syllipsis, is the suppression of a verb or a noun, in positions in which it will readily be suggested by another verb or noun, which is expressed; and with which the object, or attributive belonging to the suppressed words, appears to be connected. Ex. "And his mouth was opened immediately, and his tongue [loosed]." "forbidding to marry, and [commanding] to abstain from meats;" "my paternal house is desolate, and he himself [my father]

destitute and in exile."

73. PROSODY treats of the laws of metrical compositions, regarding accent, quantity, rhythm, rhyme, alliteration, &c. &c.

Accent is the stress laid upon one or more syllables of a word. Monosyllables are capable of accents only when they are uttered with other words. Ex. Fáther, industry, nightingale, himself, disséver,
exquisitely, whatsoéver, volúptuous;—
"there is thát in his fáce, which léads one to trúst him."

Quantity is the time required to pronounce a syllable, and is either long,
marked (-), or short, marked (v). Seëing,
úpright, pèrsonáblè, tütèlärý, peèrage,
tránslàtiòn, nòt, nòte, át, áte, tèn, tënd,
füll, cüll.

Rhythm is the harmonious arrangement
of words in lines of various definite lengths;
and is one of the chief elements of metre.

Ex. "The póetry of eárrth is néver déad."
"The willow léaves that dâncèd in the light brécze."

"Füll mány a glórious mórning háve I
séén

Fláttèr the móuntain-tóps with sóve-
reign éye."

"Sée the dáy begins to bréák."

"Lessons swéet of spring retúrning."

"At the clóse of the dáy, when the hámlet is stíll."

74. Rhyme is the correspondence of the final sound in a metrical line, with those of one or more other lines preceding or following, immediately or alternately. It is distinguished into assonance and consonance; the former being the correspondence of the vowel sounds alone, the latter of both vowels and consonants. Ex.

"The baron he stroakt his dark-brown
cheeke,

And turned his heade asyde;

To whipe away the starting teare

He proudly strave to hyde."

"Have owre, have owre to Aberdour,

It's fiftie fadom deip,

And thair lies guid Sir Patrick Spence,

Wi' the Scots lords at his feit."

"My eloake it was a very good cloake,

It hath been alwayes true to the wsare,

But now it is not worth a groat;

I have had it four-and-twenty yeere."

Single and double rhymes are also to be distinguished. Ex.

"The Abbot had preached for many years,

With clear articulation,

As ever was heard in the House of Peers

Against Emancipation.

His words had made battalions quake,

Had roused the zeal of martyrs;

Had kept the Court an hour awake,

And the king himself three-quarters."

Alliteration is the commencement of two or more words, in the same or adjoining lines, with the same or closely allied sounds. Ex.

"The parted bosom clings to wonted home,
If aught that's kindred cheer the welcome hearth;

He that is lonely, hither let him roam,
And gaze complacent on congenial earth.
Greece is no lightsome land of social mirth:
But he whom Sadness sootheth may abide,
And scarce regret the region of his birth,
When wandering slow by Delphi's sacred side,
Or gazing o'er the plains, where Greek
and Persian died."

75. Specimens of the principal English metres.—In order to distinguish the different kinds of metre, certain names are borrowed from the prosody of Latin and Greek. Thus, an accented syllable preceded by one unaccented is regarded as equivalent to a long syllable following a short one, and is called an Iambic. Ex. "Away, or away; rejoice, or rejoice." An accented or long syllable before an accented or short one, is called a Trochee. Ex. "Wretched, or wretched; rising, or rising." An accented syllable followed by two unaccented is called a Dactyl. Ex. "Industry, or industry; exquisite, or exquisite." An accented syllable following two unaccented is called an Anapaest. Ex. "Lochinvar, or Lochinvar; cavalier, or cavalier."

The most common metres are varieties of the Iambic, the Trochaic, and the Anapaestic; the differences consisting in the number of Iambics, &c., in each line. Further differences arise out of the various kinds of lines, and the manner in which they are grouped so as to form the stanzas. Our examples principally illustrate the composition of single lines.

1. Iambic metre. Four syllables.

"With rávisht éars,
The mónarch héars;
Assúmes the gód,
Affécts the nód."

Six syllables.

"What though light Phœ'bus' beáms
Refrésh the sóuthern gróund,
And though the princely thrónes
With béauteous ny'mphs abóund."

Eight syllables.

"And máy at lást my wéary áge
Find óut the peáceful hermitáge,
The háiry gówn and móssy ríll."

Ten syllables. (Heroic.)

"Such swéet compúlsion dóth in músic lie,
To lúll the dáughter óf necéssity,
And kéep unstéady náture tó her láw,
And the slow wórl'd in méasured mótion dráw."

Twelve Syllables. (Alexandrine.)

"A cónstant maiden stíll she ónly díd re-
máin,
The lást her génuíne láws which stóutly
díd retáin."

Fourteen syllables.

"As'wén abóut the sílver móon, when áir
is free from wínd,
And stárs shine cléar: to whóse swéet
béams, high próspect, and the bróws
Of áll steep hílls and pínnacles, thrust úp
themsélves for shóws."

The most frequent combinations of Iambic metres are those exemplified in the following stanzas.

1. Short.

"Thou knów'st that twice a dáy
I've bróught thee, in this cán,
Fresh wáter fróm the rúnníng broók,
As cléar as éver rán."

2. Common.

"Of á' the áirts the wínd can bláw,
I déarly líke the wést;
For thére the bónnie lássie líves,
The lássie I' lo'e bést."

3. Long.

"O thou' by whóse expréssive árt
Her pérfect ímage náture seés;
In únion with the Gráces stárt,
And sweéter by' refléction pleáse."

2. Trochaic metre. Three syllables.

"Hére we máy
Thínk and práy
Béfore deáth
Stóps our bréath."

Four syllables.

"Rích the treásure, Sweét the pleásure."

Five and six syllables.

"Fíll the búmper fáir:
Évery dróp we sprínkle
O'n the brów of cáre,
Smóoths áway a wrínkle."

Seven syllables.

"Lóve is húr't with jár and fré't,
Lóve is máde a váin regrét.
Ey'es with ídle téars are wét.
Ídle hábit línks us yét."

Eight syllables.

"Bínd the séa to slúmber stíllly,
Bínd its ódour tó the líly,
Bínd the áspen né'er to quíver,
Thén bínd Lóve to lást for éver."

The most common use of this metre is in quatrains (or stanzas of four lines) of seven syllables.

There is an almost infinite variety of metres and of stanzas, produced by the intermixture of Iambics and Trochees, and of Iambic with Trochaic metres.

3. Dactylic metre.—The following specimen will suffice for the illustration of the varieties of this metre.

"Hád I a cáve on some wíld dístant shóre, Whére the wínds hówl to the wáves' dash-
íng roár;

Thére wóuld I weép my woes,
Thére seek my lóst repose,
Tíll gíef my ey'es should close,
Ne'er to wake móre."

4. Anapaestic metre.—The effect of this metre can be learned from this illustration.

"I have lóst for that fáith móre than thou
canst bestów,
As the Gód who permíts thee to próspér
doth knów;
In híis hánd is my héart and my hópe; and
in thíine,
The lánd and the lífe whích for híim I re-
síg'n."

Of the imitations of classical metres little needs to be said, except that they are not adapted to the genius of our language. Many attempts have been made to render them acceptable, some with considerable success; but the great number of our monosyllables will always prevent them from coming into general use or favour.

76. Beside the kinds of stanza given already, which are principally used in Divine service, some other kinds may be exemplified here.

1. Elegiac.

"Here résts his héad upón the láp of cáth,
A yóuth to fórtune ánd to fáme un-
knówn;
Fair science smíled not ón his húmble bírth,
And mélanchóly márk'd him fór her
ówn."

2. Ottava rima.

"'Tis swéet to héar the wátdog's hónest

Bay deép-mouth'd wélcome ás we dráw
near hóme;
'Tis swéet to knów there is an éye will
márk

Our cóming, ánd look brighter wén we

'Tis swéet to bé awáken'd by' the lárk,

III. A CONCISE HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE; WITH ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE DERIVATION AND FORMATION OF WORDS.

1. The English Language belongs to the great Indo-European family, which includes all the tongues (ancient and modern) of our quarter of the globe (except, perhaps, some in the north-eastern corner), the Armenian, the Zendish, and Persian, and all the dialects of Hindustan, which have sprung from the Sanscrit. It is a distinguished member of the Teutonic group; and is most closely related to the Dutch and German. And, as a consequence of the preëminence of Great Britain in arts, arms, and commerce, it is now spoken over a vast area in both hemispheres; and will very probably be, in time, the most extensively used of all the languages of the earth.

2. It is the lineal descendant of the language spoken by the Saxons, or Angles; whose original seat was on the lower Elbe, and who, between the years A.D. 365 and A.D. 597, established themselves in almost all those parts of this island which had been permanently occupied by the Romans; the earlier Celtic inhabitants being either absorbed or destroyed, or driven into the mountainous regions of Galloway, Cumberland, Wales, and Cornwall. Upon the pagan invaders, who were but little removed from their primitive barbarism, the effete civilisation and the corrupted Christianity, which the Romans had planted in the island, could make but little impression. And the scanty number of British words adopted into the English language from the conquered race (who have preserved their native tongue, even to the present day, in Wales) may be regarded as a fair measure of the influence which the Celts of Britain exercised over their Teutonic conquerors.

We have few, if any, authentic memorials of the Saxon tongue prior to the year A.D. 597, except the names of persons and places; from which very little beyond the roots and simplest elements of some words can be learned. But from that time until the conversion of Anglo-Saxon into English, we possess an increasingly great number of authentic documents, which exhibit the structure and components of the language with the most satisfactory clearness.

3. During all the time that Anglo-Saxon was spoken here, the dialects used in different parts of England necessarily exhibited diversities as striking as those which are found at present in the popular speech of the various provinces. Those of the West and of Saxon Scotland were characterized by a considerable infusion of the Celtic element; whilst those north of the Humber and of East Anglia showed the effects of the Danish settlers in those regions; and the provincial dialects still exhibit the same peculiarities. From the ecclesiastics, whose professional tongue was low Church-Latin, there was a direct contribution of words to the literary vocabulary of the Anglo-Saxons; and, probably enough, to them may also be ascribed some of the grammatical peculiarities of their written language, as we have received it.

4. Not until the Norman Conquest, however, was any strongly marked change in the language effected. The French, which the new lords of the country spoke, was not the native tongue of their race, but had been learned since their acquisition of Neustria. They attempted strenuously, but vainly, to retain their Romance dialect, as a badge of their superiority. Before the end of two hundred years, we find a royal proclamation, the dialect of which, whilst it shows that the Normans had been compelled to make themselves masters of the language of their thralls, also records with great exactness the effects of their influence upon it, and marks the transition from Anglo-Saxon to English. This is not the only specimen of our English in its first stage; there are several famous old ballads and poems, and amongst others the Chronicle of Robert of Gloucester, which strongly confirm the conclusions derived from Henry the Third's Proclamation.

5. The next stage is indicated by the poems of Chaucer, the writings of Wicliffe, and the Travels of Sir John Mandeville; in all which we see a kind of English, in its words, not so different from the English of to-day as many of our provincial dialects are. Caxton, and the introduction of the art of printing into England, may be noted as the indications of another stage in this progress. The French has by this time been driven out of every field, except the law; and the obstinacy with which it has clung to that last stronghold may be seen in the retention to our own times of the phrases (such as "La Reine le veut") used in giving or withholding the Royal assent to Acts of Parliament.

6. In the reign of Henry the Eighth, two great events occurred which inaugurated a new era for our tongue,—the revival of the study of the classical languages, and the Reformation, which brought in its train English translations of the Bible, English Rituals and Homilies, and thus greatly promoted the change which has here been traced. Last of all may be named the writers of the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century, who show the full and perfect growth of the English language. The few and slight traces of antiquity in the Authorized Version of the Holy Scripture and in the Plays of Shakspeare, which are the greatest productions of this period, prove what has been said.

7. Of Milton and the great writers before the year A.D. 1700, and of the brilliant constellation which won for the reign of Anne the designation of "the Augustan age of English Literature," it is unnecessary to speak. They wrote the language which we speak; and it is more by individual peculiarities, than by such as characteristically distinguish one age from another, that they are separated from the writers who have followed them, and from those which now worthily uphold the renown of our national genius.

8. It has been since the year A.D. 1500, that almost all the direct importations of words from the Greek and Latin languages have taken place into English; in the first instance, owing to the excessive zeal with which the great scholars devoted themselves to the study of the classics; but subsequently, in great part, as a consequence of the advance of science, which has been ever demanding new terms to register her discoveries with, and to diffuse the knowledge of them amongst men. The efforts which were made by the first great lexicographer of the English language, to corroborate and extend the use of words derived from the Latin, have signally failed; and amongst the signs of the present times, must be particularly mentioned the disposition to employ words of Saxon origin, because of their force and picturesqueness; rather than Latinized terms, which are in general both vague and feeble.

9. A large influx of Oriental words took place as the result of the Crusades; but the principal additions from foreign languages, other than the classical and Romance tongues, have been made since the time when geographical discovery stimulated the commercial enterprise, and opened to England the empire of the sea.

10. Specimens of the English language at successive stages of its progress.

1. Anglo-Saxon. Matthew, chap. v. ver. 43, &c. :—

"Ge gehyrdon thæt gecweden wæs lufa thurne nextan, and hata thurne feond; sothlice ic secge eow : luflath eowre fynd, and doth wel thām the eow yfel doth, and gebiddath for eowre ehteras and tælendum eow; thæt ge sīn eowres fæder beam, the on heofonum ys, sethe deth thæt his sunne up-a-springth ofer thā gōdan and ofer thā yfelan, and he læt rinan ofer thā rihtwisan and over thā unrihtwisan."

2. Henry the Third's Proclamation :—

"Witen ge well alle, thæt we willen and unnen thæt ure rædesmen alle, other the moare del of heom, thæ beoth ichosen thurg us and thurg thæt loandes-folk on ure Kuneriche, habbith idon, and schullen don, in the worthnes of God, and ure threowthe, for the freme of the loande, thurg the besigte of than toforen iseide rædesmen, beo stedfæst and ilestinde in alle thinge abutan ænde, and we heaten alle ure treowe, in the treowthe thæt heo us ogen, that heo stede-fesliche healden and weren to healden, &c. &c."

3. Sir John Mandeville :—

"In that londe, ne in many othere beyonde that, no man may see the sterre transmontane, that is clept the sterre of the see, that is unmevable, and that is toward the Northe, that we clepen the Lode-sterre. But men seen another sterre, the contrarye to him, that is toward the southe, that is clept Antartyk. And right as the schipmen taken here avys here, and govern hem be the Lode-sterre, right so don schipmen beyonde the parties be the sterre of the southe, the which sterre apperethe not to us. And this sterre, that is toward the northe, that wee clepen the Lode-sterre, ne apperethe not to hem. For whiche cause men may wel pereeyve, that the lond and the see ben of rownde schapp and forme. For the partie of the firmament schewethe in o contree, that schewethe not in another contree. And men may well proven be experience and sotyle compassement of wytt, that gif a man fond passages be schippes, that wolde go to serchen the world, men myghte go be schippe alle aboute the world, and aboven and benethen. The whiche thing I prove thus, aftre that I have seyn. &c. &c."

4. Chaucer. "Gode counsaile" :—

"Flie fro the prese and dwell with sothfastnesse, Suffise unto thy gode though it be snalle,
For horde hath hate, and climbyng tikilnesse,
Freee hath envie, and wee it brent oer all,
Savor no more than the behovin shall,
Rede well thyself, that othir folke canst rede,
And trouthe the shall delivir it is no drede,
Paine the not eche crokid to redresse,
In trust of her that tournith as a balle,
Grete rest standith in litel businesse,
Beware also to spurne against a nalle,
Strive not as doith a crocke with a walle,

Demith thyself that demist othir's dede,

And trouthe the shall delivir it is no drede.

That the is sent receve in buxomenesse ;
The wrastlyng of this worlde asketh a falle :

Here is no home, here is but wildirnesse,

Forthe pilgrim, forthe o best out of thy stall,

Loke up on high, and thanke thy God of all,

Weivith thy luste, and let thy ghost the lede,

And throuthe the shall delivir, it is no drede."

5. Wickliffe. The "Magnificat." Luke, chap. i. ver. 42, &c. "My soul magnifieth the Lord; and my spiryt hath gladdid in God myn helthe; for he hath behulden the mekeness of his handmayden. For lo, for this alle generatiouns schulen seye that I am blessid; for he that is mighti hath don to me grete thingis, and his name is holy. And his mersy is fro kyndrede into kyndredis to men that dreden him. He made myght in his arm, he seateride proude men with the thoughte of his herte. He sette down myghty men fro seete, and enhaunsid meke men. He hath fulfillid hungry men with goodis, and he has lefte riche men vande. He havynge mynde of his merey tooke up Israel his child, as he hath spokun to oure fadris, to Abraham, and to his seed into worldis."

Letter to Pope Urban VI.

"I have joyfully to telle alle trew men the bileve that I hold, and algatis to the Pope. For I suppose, that if my faith be rightful and geven of God, the Pope will gladly conserve it: and if my faith be error, the Pope will wisely amend it. I suppose over this, that the Gospel of Christ be part of the corps of God's lawe. For I beleve that Jesu Christ, that gaf in his own persoun this Gospel, is very God and very mon, and be this it passes all other lawes. I suppose over this, that the Pope be most oblishid to the keping of the Gospel among all men that liven here. For the Pope is highest vicar that Christ hath here in erth. For moreness of Christ's vicars is not measured by worldly moreness, bot by this, that this vicar sues more Christ by vertuous living; for thus teches the Gospel. That this is the sentence of Christ and of his Gospel I take as bileve; that Christ for time that he walked here was most poore man of all, both in spirit and in haveing; for Christ says that he had noht for to rest his hede on. And over this I take as bileve, that no man schulde sue the Pope, ne no saint &c."

6. Sir Thomas More :—

"Kynge Edward in his life, albeit that this discepcion beetwene hys frendes somewhat yrked hym; yet in his good health he somewhat the lesse regarded it; because hee thought whatsoeuer busines shoulde falle betwene them, hymselfe shoulde alwaye bee hable to rule bothe the parties. But in his last secknesse, when he receiued his natural strengthe soo sore enfebled, that hee dyspayred all recouerye, then hee consyderynge the youthe of his chyl dren, albeit he nothings lesse mis-trusted then that that happened, yet well forseynge that manye harmes myghte growe by theyr debate, whyle the youth of hys echildren shoulde lacke discrecion of themself and good counsayle of their frendes, of which either part yhold counsayle for their owne commodity, and rather by pleasante aduyse too wynne themselfe fauour, than by profitable aduertisemente to do the children good, he called some of them before him that were at uariance, and in especyall the Lorde Marques Dorsette, the quenes sonne by her fyrst housebande, and Richarde the Lorde Hastynges, a noble man, than lorde chaumberlayne, agayne whome the quene specially grudged, for the great fauoure the Kyng bore hym, and also for that shee thoughte him seeretly familer with the Kynge in wanton companye. &c. &c."

7. Earl of Surry :—

"Description of Spring, wherin eech thing renewes, save only the lover.

"The soote season that bud and bloome fourthe bringes,

With grene hath eladde the hylle, and eke the vale,

The nightingall with fethers new she singes;

The turtle to her mate hathe tolde her tale;

Somer is come, for every spray now springes;

The hart hath hunge hys olde head on the pale,

The bucke in brake hys winter coate he flynges;

The fishes flete with new repayred scale;

The adder alle her slough awaye she flynges;

The swift swallow pursueth the flies smalle;

The busie bee her honie how she mynges;

Winter is worne, that was the flouris bale.

And thus I see among these pleasant thynges,

Eche eare decays, and yet my sorrow sprynges."

11. Illustrations of the derivation and formation of words.—No part of the modern science of grammar is of greater or more general interest, than that which treats of the derivation and formation of words; and in none have more important results been secured. The account which can be given here of the labours of philologists in this rich field must, of necessity, be exceedingly brief, and at the utmost can serve only to show the kind of conclusions which have been established, and to intimate the nature of the evidence which has been employed; so as, perhaps, to stimulate to further reading and inquiry

It has already been stated, that our English tongue is the lineal descendant of the language spoken by the Saxons or Angles, who came over to this island from the country about the lower Elbe, in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries of our era. The following lists of English words will demonstrate this fact; and will also show that nearly all our most common words are of native origin. In addition to the Anglo-Saxon equivalents, a few specimens of kindred words in other Teutonic languages are given, for the purpose of illustrating what has been intimated of the relation of our tongue to the German and Scandinavian languages. Did space permit, similar illustrations from the entire range of the Indo-European languages could be added; but those must be sought elsewhere.

The following lists of English words have been formed, as specimens and illustrations of the facts above stated. They could not be made complete, without occupying greater space than we could afford to this subject: and it was not thought desirable to make them uniform, because so many more aspects of etymological research could be exhibited by the plan adopted.

Words compounded with prepositions and particles have been generally omitted; and sometimes more ancient forms of words than modern dictionaries insert have been given. Questionable etymologies have been, as far as possible, avoided; and only the immediate sources of our English words pointed out. Those lists will, however, afford much instruction respecting the history of our native tongue; and suggest much beneficial and entertaining inquiry to observant minds. And it is for this purpose, chiefly, that they have been extended so far as to afford a view of the origin of a very large proportion of the words now in daily use where the English language is spoken.

NEW AND ENLARGED

DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE,

WITH MORAL MAXIMS, ALPHABETICALLY ARRANGED.

AAR

A TRULY GREAT MAN BORROWS NO LUSTRE FROM SPLENDID ANCESTRY.

A THE first letter of the alphabet in almost all languages, has five different sounds: the broad sound, as all, wall; the open, as father, rather; and the slender or close, as place, face; and two short sounds, as in what, squat; and cat, map. It is used, before words beginning with a consonant, for an (which signifies one), as a horse, a tree. And it represents the Saxon prefix in such words as asleep, a-going, a-building. [See Abbreviations.]

G.

G HAS two sounds; its proper sound is heard in gag, good, gum, glad, gray, and always when followed, as in these words, by a, o, u, l, and r; and sometimes before e, i, and y; or when it ends a syllable, except after n, as sing. It is formed by the pressure of the sides of the tongue against the palate and of the lip against the lower teeth; and by impelling the breath from the throat. The other sound exactly resembles that of j; and is heard before e, i, and y only, as ginger, energy. Before n and m it is almost always mute. When followed by h, it has the sounds of ff and w, and is sometimes mute.

H.

H IN English, as in other languages, is the mark of aspiration, or strong emission of the breath before a vowel sound. It is mute in many words, as hour, heir, honour. When combined with consonants it preserves its own sound in words like which, what, but preceding the w: with t, it assists in representing two sounds for which we have no characters, as thin, thine; and with g, represents a guttural which is now disused, as high, fight; with p, it forms an f sound, as physic; it has other sounds in church and shine; and no sound in rhetoric.

I.

I IS the third vowel and ninth letter of the English alphabet. It has a long sound, as fine, thine, which is usually marked by an e final; or a short sound, as fin, thin. Prefixed to e it makes a diphthong of the same sound as double e, as field, yield; and subjoined to a or e it makes other diphthongs, as fail, neigh. When it precedes a or o, and follows c or t, it indicates the aspirate and sibilant sound, as gracious, diction, christian; and the same before e, and following s, z, as, hosier, grazier.
